Murder at MOCKING HOUSE

BY WALTER C. BROWN
A corridor separated the two suites, running diagonally from the elevators for a distance, then turning right at a slight angle, and straightening again to finish in a cul-de-sac, a brace of high, deep windows, from which fell a sheer drop to the street, far below.

Chapter 10

THE AUSTERLITZ

DOYLE had gone to a bench in the hall and sat down. He knew that it would be useless to try any questions on the Detective Sergeant at this stage of the game. He lit a cigarette, and unfolded the evening paper he had been carrying in his overcoat pocket. Whistling softly to himself, he turned to the society columns. Harper went outside with Connolly. The portico light shone down over the curved front steps and the white, unbroken blanket of snow that covered the lawn.

"Use my footprints as a guide for the path," Harper directed. "Make it about a foot wide and pile the snow neatly beside it. Don't scatter it around haphazardly." He went down the left curve of the steps and along the left side of the walk, clear of the other prints. Connolly began to ply his shovel.

The official car, in which Harper had come from Headquarters to the house on Powhatan Terrace, stood at the curb, the uniformed chauffeur at the wheel.

"How fast can you get back into town?" Harper asked as he got in.

"Oh, about twelve minutes, or fifteen. Where do you want to go, Sergeant?"

"The Austerlitz."

With the siren sounding, they went plunging on as speedily as was possible with the streets so snow-laden and the visibility so poor. But the chauffeur's most expert efforts could not make good his estimate, for it took him exactly twenty-two minutes to reach the Austerlitz.

The detective walked through the ornate lobby and went to the marble-fronted desk. The night manager and his assistant, both of whom had been introduced to him earlier in the evening, greeted him. "Has anything been quiet?" he asked.

The manager nodded. "All serene, Sergeant. It's not very likely that we'll have any trouble in a place like this."

HARPER turned away and walked over to the secluded corner where "Camera Eye" Japhie had announced himself, quietly watching from behind a spread newspaper. "How's everything, Japhie?"

"All quiet along the Potomac, Sergeant."

Harper crossed the lobby and stepped into an elevator. As the doors slid open and Harper emerged on the twenty-eighth floor, the two detectives on guard there turned to see who had arrived. Markson was one of them, the other a Central District man whose face Harper recognized, but whose name he did not know.

The topmost door of the Austerlitz was divided between two suites. The one to the left of the entrance was Dufresne's, the one to the right that of the Hon. Royal Sanders, Senator and ex-Senator, who was abroad at this time. His suite had been closed for months and the doors locked and sealed.
