'NO DICTATORS', BRITISH CABINET WARNS MOSLEY

By Harold P. Braman
LONDON (AP) — Downing Street has a new sign: "No Dictators Wanted."

The sign, figuratively printed, was erected by the joint efforts of Ramsay MacDonald, the prime minister, and several of his cabinet as a result of the increasing prominence of the British fascist movement.

MacDonald and the national government, by this action, focused official attention on Sir Oswald Mosley and his black shirts for the first time.

Riots Bring Recognition
For many months the government declined to be drawn into public statements on Mosley and his followers. The policy was not to dignify the movement by official recognition.

A series of incidents, however, changed that policy, and fascists have been jibing at the cabinet for what it termed "sudden alarm."

Mosley has been having big meetings, some more or less private, and the communists and other left groups have been making the most of the situation.

Climaxes have occurred at all public gatherings of this nature and the fighting has been increasingly bitter.

The brawling brought about the government's official acknowledgment that a fascist movement exists in fact, once the cabinet leaped into the fascist-communist controversy, it made a good job of it.

Tories Lead Attacks
No less than eight ministers made speeches denouncing Mosley and his black shirts and some of the strongest language was used by conservatives.

There have been many political observers who had termed the Mosley men "tory storm troops," but these outbursts by Tory leaders were taken as an indication that the conservative party, as a unit, doesn't want him.

MacDonald, sometimes hard to arouse, came out publicly against the black shirts only after long cogitation.

"This country will accept no dictatorship," the prime minister warned. "Great Britain wants no tampering with the liberties of a democracy."

Fascism has also been getting plenty of attention in parliament hardly a day passes but that some member asks a question of a minister about fascist activities or denounces Mosley.

The press, too, is giving more space to the fascists' movements, especially when there's a riot.
