MURDER AT MOCKING HOUSE

BY WALTER C. BROWN

our discoveries but I'll hold back as much as I can.

"I'm curious to hear how he's going to wiggle out of that denial about the revolver."

"I was surprised," Harper admitted. "His best move would have been to acknowledge ownership of the gun and then act surprised when it is found to be missing."

Laffery yawned. "I'd like a little more action. This house is as quiet as a museum. I'd like to catch that Andrews fellow listening at a key-hole or have a good run-in with Donaghy. What's next on the cards?"

HARPER consulted his list of memoranda. "Call up Headquarters and tell them to send up a plainclothesman. We'll send him off on a round of the theatrical outfit and costumers to see if he can find where that disguise was bought."

"Then get hold of the reporters and announce that we want the cooperation of all garages in finding the car which our man must have used. If they run that in connection with the dead man's picture I might lead to something. Now I'm going upstairs to have a little visit with Mrs. Dufresne."

The detective went up to the second floor and knocked quietly on the bedroom door. There was an answering rustle from within, then the door opened a few inches and a woman in a starched white dress and nurse's cap looked out. Her plain, severe features, innocent of all cosmetics, expressed annoyance.

"I'm Sergeant Harper," the detective announced. "I came up to see how Mrs. Dufresne is progressing."

"She is asleep just now," the nurse answered in low, precise tones.

"You are the nurse Dr. Ulrich sent for last night?"

"Yes, My name is Burkett."

Harper smiled and bowed slightly. "I suppose Mrs. Dufresne is not allowed out of bed?"

"No indeed."

Harper noticed Miss Burkett's weary eyes and tired look. "I guess you could do with some sleep yourself," he said, kindly. "You've been on the job nearly twelve hours, haven't you?"

"The relief nurse will be here at noon," Miss Burkett answered shortly and turned back into the room, closing the door quietly but firmly.

They certainly have a cordial and unanimous dislike for us in this house, mused Harper, eyeing the closed door. I suppose the great Ulrich has been telling her what casks we are. Well, there is one thing certain at least—Mrs. Dufresne didn't run off with her husband's revolver. But this thought brought up its natural corollary—had Pierre Dufresne acted thus to screen his wife?

Andrews approached him as he reached the foot of the stairs. "You are wanted in the breakfast-room sir. The gentlemen have arrived."

The detective thought there was an undertone of malicious pleasure in the butler's announcement, but he said nothing.

Harper entered the breakfast-room to find not only the redoubtable James J. Connors, Director of Police, but also Captain Mackle, of the homicide bureau, the Sergeant's immediate superior. Pierre Dufresne was there also and the three men were talking together in a very friendly manner.

The detective saluted sharply and the salute was returned.

Harper has trouble, tomorrow, with the peacemakers.
