Resolution Asks Electric Probe

OMAHA, Aug. 4 (UP)—Resolution demanding investigation of the new national association of electric companies was forwarded today after its adoption by the executive committee of the regional committee for a Missouri Valley Authority.
The committee, headed by Lief Erickson, Helena, Mont., charged 30 organizations have banded together in a Washington lobby to defeat legislation to create river valley authorities.

MVA proponents asked in the resolution that the FPC investigate "the financial support, character, activities and plans of the new national association of electric companies," and that the senate authorize a similar investigation of "all organizations in the so-called water lobby."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Spirit of Isaac's Wife, Rebekah, Could Save Many Modern Homes

Scripture: Genesis, Chapters 21-24

By WILLIAM S. GILROY, D.D.
The testing time of pioneer settlement and achievement comes in the second and third generations. Will the children and grandchildren of the pioneers retain and manifest the pioneer spirit of faith, courage, and endurance; or will they take things easier, enjoying the heredities of their fathers (and mothers) that the labors and sacri-

A minister who was located for a number of years in Plymouth, and who was familiar with the history and records of the colony from the time of the Pilgrim Fathers, once told me there was a marked deterioration in morale in the second and third generations. The American adage that "it is three generations from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves" is born of experience, in the observation of the history of many families and fortunes—a great build-up by a founder of energy, vision, and ability that has quickly gone to pieces under sons or grandsons who have been incompetents or wasters.

We all inherit something however little it may be, and our character and achievement are determined by what we do ourselves, not by what has been done for us. Isaac is the example of a man who made good use of his heritage. To be the son of Abraham and carry on in the spirit of that noble and energetic father was no small task.
He seems to have been a dutiful son, for when his father planned a marriage for him with a kinswoman, in the land from which Abraham had come, he apparently made no objection, but waited patiently for the bride to arrive.

What would Isaac have done if the bride, his cousin, whom Abraham's servant brought back with him from Mesopotamia, had proved less attractive? We do not know, but the love story related in Genesis 24 is one of those beautiful stories of love and marriage that light up pages of the Old Testament, often darkened by the records of warfare and strife, and by the cruelties and crudities of primitive times.

These darker things are not absent, even from the story of Abraham. It is with more than a twinge of pity that one reads of his sending Hagar, with her baby, out into the desert, with only a bottle of water and a loaf of bread; and the unpleasant story of Abraham representing his wife to be his sister is repeated in almost exactly the same way with regard to Isaac.

It is evident that traditions of this sort found their way into the Scriptures without much care as to their accuracy, and this accounts for the contrast between the loftiest sentiments and actions, and the crudest and least worthy, that often appear side by side.

Among the beautiful things is the picture of Rebekah, the young virgin, showing hospitality to Abraham's servant, weary and thirsty from his long journey, and fulfilling the servant's notion that if a young woman should offer him drink, and give water to his camels as well, it would be a sign that she was the one for whom he had come looking as a wife for Isaac. Rebekah, too, was willing; and in addition to the heritage that Abraham left Isaac, his father's wisdom secured for him a good wife. It might be well if some such test as the giving of drink to a stranger and the watering of the camels were required of every candidate for marriage. The lack of the spirit of Rebekah has been the ruin of many homes.
