WASHINGTON (UPI) - Presient Eisenhower backed away fast from his own suggestion that, better. maybe, our machinery for national government is so creaky as to require big emergency repairs He shouldn't have run so fast. Eisenhower was in good company but didn't know it.

What the President said at this week's news conference was in response to a question about how government shall function if the voters persist in giving to one party the White House and to another the Congress. He answered like this:

"I detect... support for some change, even... basic constitu-tional change, so that we could of the features of the parliamentary system."

In Congress, for years past, there have been members of the same political party who rarely if ever voted together on any major piece of legislation.

Such a situation is dangerous to a party in power and dangerous for the nation over which that party attempts to exercise power. Perhaps no proper discipline ev-

But, a means of obtaining a better coordination between the executive and legislative branches and of exerting greater pressure for agreement on overall policy has been suggested from time to time. It would require amendment

. The idea is not new. Woodrow Wilson suggested it many years

"What is the change proposed?" he wrote. "Simply to give to the heads of the executive depart-ments seats in Congress, with the privilege of initiative in legislation and some part of the unbounded privileges now commanded by the Standing Committees. It almost surely would lead to a smoother functioning of government."

Newton D. Baker had the same idea. He wrote:

"It is far more loyal to the memory of the founders of our government to try to be as wise in our day as they were wise in theirs than it is blindly to try to perpetuate the mere machinery they found adequate for their needs into a time when that machinery is plainly inadequate."
