FRED DANZIG SAYS:

TV Baseball Is Like Watching Strip-Tease

NEW YORK (UPI)—Watching baseball on TV is a lot like watching a strip-tease. In each case, you don't get to see all that you think you're entitled to.

This certainly was the case Tuesday when NBC-TV carried the 26th annual All-Star game from Forbes Field in Pittsburgh, which the National League won, 5-4.

The one-dimensional approach of the TV cameras is what bugs me. They can show the pitcher batter confrontation or the fielder-base runner relationship. Rarely do you see all of it at one time. They've been televising ball games for a dozen years now and nobody has been able to solve the problem. I guess the answer is to have a camera in a helicopter over the ballpark.

Anyhow, director Harry Coyle's camera crew Tuesday showed viewers as much as possible. They used two cameras behind home plate — one almost on the field, the other in the stands. Another camera was located over the center field wall and it could zoom in on the pitcher-batter scene.

If a base runner was on second when the center field camera was in use, you could see him jumping around the base paths. But base runners on first and third were lost to the TV audience during pitches. This left me feeling something like a horse with blinders on.

Announcers Mel Allen and Curt Gowdy seemed to be trying very hard to avoid clichés and malapropisms and, in general, they succeeded. I caught only one slip: When Gowdy referred to a player as "the ex-great Yankee,"

Both Allen and Gowdy were stuck on wrists. Allen spoke of short-stop Ernie Banks' "powerful wrists" and a few innings later Gowdy called attention to outfielder Hank Aaron's "tremendous wrists." Both players looked thin.

I counted 15 razor blade or pen commercials during the 2-hour, 25-minute game, an average of one every 10 minutes or so. Some commercials were four minutes apart, others 20 minutes apart. I know it may have seemed like more, but that's not bad at all, considering the commercials used less than 10 minutes, according to my watch.

Trujillo Tightens Security

CIUDAD TRUJILLO, Dominican Republic (UPI)—The Dominican government tightened security measures today against the possibility of a terrorist campaign or an armed invasion aimed at overthrowing the Trujillo regime.

This capital was filled with rumors of an invasion launched from Cuba through Haiti, of abandoned invasion boats being sighted on beaches, and of arrests of underground agents.

None could be confirmed but a government spokesman said the armed forces had tightened security measures and were maneuvering around Santiago, second largest Dominican city.

Political observers familiar with the situation said there was an extremely high possibility that a campaign of terrorism would be the next step in the Caribbean war of nerves, particularly in view of the success of Fidel Castro's similar operations during his revolution in Cuba.

Informed sources said there were three explosions in public places in Ciudad Trujillo Saturday night. The government explained only one of them.

Dominican authorities said they felt well able to cope with any terrorist campaign because the government has the support of the people.

The navy and air force were maintaining around-the-clock patrols of the coast but most observers expect any invasion would be launched across the border from Haiti, which shares the Caribbean island with the Dominican Republic.

The Channel Swim: A cigar sponsor has signed Ernie Kovacs as moderator of a new panel show called Take a Good Look, slated for ABC-TV on Thursday nights starting Oct. 15. Originating in Hollywood, this panel show will have present-day celebrities trying to guess identities of latter-day celebs. Jaye P. Morgan will be the co-star with Tony Bennett on the NBC-TV Perry Presents hour starting Saturday, Aug. 1.

Next Saturday's replacement for Teresa Brewer, who was dropped on Monday, will be Gloria De Haven. Miss Brewer has signed for three appearances on the Ed Sullivan Show starting in the fall.

Music for a Summer Night will present a one-hour version of Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" on ABC-TV Wednesday, July 15. Elaine Malbin and Davis Cunningham will portray Cho-Cho-San and Lt. Pinkerton, respectively.

Brenner, the series about police problems, may fade from CBS-TV with the summer season. Hans Conried has signed as co-star with William Bendix in the Sunday, Aug. 16 NBC-TV special, "The Ransom of Red Chief." Nat King Cole's brother Eddie is getting a big buildup. The young singer will be on the ABC-TV Dick Clark Show July 25 and featured in the forthcoming series, Bourbon Street Beat, scheduled to debut on ABC-TV Oct. 5.

Peck managed to combine artistic qualities and manhood very well. To be successful an actor should be a man first, a performer second.

The 6-foot 5-inch 200-pounder has been a writer, painter, photographer, professional skipper and sculptor. In his free time he plays basketball, boxes, and is a nut on skin-diving and fishing.

YOUNG ACTOR MAY 'SAVE' AMERICAN MALE IN FILM

HOLLYWOOD (UPI)—Don't give up hope men, there's a chance we may yet be portrayed in TV and film stories as something other than psychoneurotics or gung-hoing goons.

There is a happy medium somewhere, and young (26) Gardner McKay, who is starring in a new video series, thinks he's found it. McKay, a newcomer who looks like a cross between Clark Gable and Tyrone Power, plays a schooner skipper in "Adventures in Paradise," patterned after James Michener's famed stories of the South Pacific.

The guy's not only handsome, he's a departure from the "I've got bit problems" actors who must commune with their psychiatrists before kissing the leading lady. Additionally, Gardner is a he-man off-screen.

Tired of Neurotics "The public is tiring of neurotic heroes," he said during lunch at 20th Century-Fox Studios, where the series is being filmed.

"A hero's problems should be real, not psychological. And if you ask me, the same thing goes for actors. Sure, I have a little of the poet in me—every man does. I think Errol Flynn and Gregory Peck managed to combine artistic qualities and manhood very well.
