Princess Anne In Training For Big Race

LONDON (UPI) — Princess Anne has been sprinting up and down behind the walls of Buckingham Palace, palace sources said today.

The reason: The princess wants to speed up her dashes to uphold the honor of the royal family.

Last year's annual sports day at Cheam School, where her to the throne Prince Charles is a pupil, featured a race for pupils' sisters. Princess Anne ran her mightiest in the race, but was badly beaten.

Palace sources said she was determined to do better this year, so as not to let her brother down. And with the annual sports day Saturday, she has been "putting in some intensive sprint training these past few weeks with the Buckingham Palace Brownie pack, the sources said.

If you can lift this top safely, don't overlook sudsing off the table rim that supports the glass. Food apricles and spilled liquids can build up a gummy mess which needs to be washed away.

These lightweight panels — which are as washable as they are water-resistant and shatterproof — feature butterflies, leaves, and other refreshing designs from nature.

Catholic Church In France Trying To Re-convert Nation

Editors note:
Louis Casseles, prize-winning writer for United Press International on religion in America, is currently in Europe. This is one of several dispatches in which he is reporting on religious developments abroad.

By LOUIS CASSELES
UPI Staff Writer

PARIS (UPI) — The Catholic church in France is grappling boldly with a task unique in religious history.

It is trying to re-convert a nominally-Christian nation that has lapsed into paganism.

Ecclesiastical leaders like Maurice Cardinal Feltin, Archbishop of Paris, are completely realistic about the situation that confronts the church. They describe France as a "de-Christianized" country which can be won back to the church only through earnest, imaginative missionary efforts.

French bishops are not indulging in overstatement when they call modern France a "mission field." Although 94 per cent of the people are baptized Catholics, surveys indicate that only about 20 per cent actually practice the faith. And this 20 per cent is drawn primarily from the rural areas of the provinces and from the upper economic groups of the cities.

Few Working Class Goers

Among working class Frenchmen, the number of practicing Catholics is much smaller. A careful check in one urban industrial parish showed only 600 regular church goers in a population of 19,000 persons. There is one parish which has not recorded a baptism, marriage or burial for 20 years.

Many historical factors have contributed to the estrangement of the French masses from the church. For centuries before the French revolution, the church was closely identified with the privileged classes. The revolution of 1789 was as much a revolt against the church itself as against the monarchy which it had supported.

Although anti-clericalism, in the sense of active hostility toward the church, has declined markedly in recent years, many Frenchmen still regard the church as a bulwark of political conservatism.

'More Superstition Than Faith'

Another basic factor is that religion in France had tended to degenerate into formal observances — as one Jesuit scholar put it, "There was more superstition than faith" — and hence was particularly vulnerable to attack by the militant atheists of the 18th century "age of reason."

Church leaders know that this heritage of bitterness and distrust cannot be quickly overcome. They have embarked, with humility and determination, on a long-range effort to show skeptical Frenchmen that Christianity is not an empty ritual nor a tool of the vested interests.

One project on which much progress has already been achieved is the revitalization of worship. Liturgical reforms have made the celebration of mass more meaningful to French Catholics. There is heavy emphasis on the congregation's duty to participate rather than sit as passive spectators.

Literature Has Helped

A massive output of scholarly literature, by both clergymen and laymen, has helped to restore religion to a position of intellectual respectability. In fact, the most obvious signs of religious revival in France today are among the intellectuals, particularly the students and faculty of great universities like the Sorbonne.

The church is also living down its reputation as a citadel of political stand-pattism. To a degree that alarms many conservative Catholics, bishops and priests are taking outspoken, liberal stands on such issues as the Algerian war and the socialization of industry.

'Worker-Priest' Movement

This was the idea behind the "worker-priest" movement in which young priests exchanged their clerical costumes for overalls and took jobs in factories. The Vatican placed restrictions on this movement in 1953 after reports indicated that some of the worker-priests were entering into their role so enthusiastically that they were getting infected with Communist doctrines. But about 100 worker-priests are still in Paris factories, limiting their work to three hours a day to conform to Vatican rules. And Cardinal Feltin went to Rome last month, reportedly to ask Pope John XXIII for permission to expand the movement.

At Pontigny, about 75 miles southeast of Paris, Cardinal Lienart has set up a new seminary to give special training to priests to work among unbelievers and lapsed Catholics. This project, called the "Mission of France," now has some 300 priests at work in 80 communities of France, and 82 more in training.

Laymen Being Drafted

Christian laymen are also being drafted into missionary effort, not to preach but to demonstrate through their daily work the emphasis which their faith places on service to mankind. For example, there is one organization called Catholic Workers Action in which membership is limited to those who are "engaged in helping their brothers." Significantly, holding office in a trade union is listed as one good way of serving fellow man.

Is all of this activity achieving any results? Cardinal Lienart's answer is that "Before the harvest can be reaped, the ground must be cleared and the seeds planted."

"This has been done," says the Cardinal, "and the work is beginning to bear fruit."
