Pope John has been taking les sons in English, but he does not yet feel sufficiently at home in the language to use it for con-versation. When he talks with a non-Italian visitor, he usually speaks in rapid, fluent French, which he learned during his years as Papal nuncio to France. Al ways at his elbow during an audience is Msgr. Thomas Ryan, a 6-foot Irish priest who is prepared to serve as interpreter in any one six languages.
Gestures Expressively

The Pope barely waits, how-ever, for Msgr. Ryan to translate a speech. As a true Italian, he uses his hands as tools of articulation that transcend all linguistic barriers. When he really warms up to a subject, he gestures so fervently and expressively that his skull cap begins to slip. At the precise moment when it seems certain to fall to the floor, he reaches up and deftly restores it to its place. This gesture is accompanied by an amused look at the visitor which seems to say,

'Ha, I fooled you!"
Although his wit and good humor are in sharp contrast to the austere personality of his predecessor, it is highly misleading to depict Pope John — as a growing legend tends to do — soley in terms of a bouncy little man who loves to do unconventional things.
