

Nehru 'Eating Crow' Over Border Dispute

By PHIL NEWSOM
UPI Staff Writer

Back in the spring of 1954, Indian Premier Jawaharlal Nehru was receiving plaudits on the five-point non-aggression pact he had just signed with Red China. Later, in 1955, it was held up at the Bandung Conference of the Afro-Asian nations as a model of the sort of neutrality Nehru advocated.

It had five points: Mutual respect for each other's territorial integrity, mutual non-aggression, mutual non-interference in each other's internal affairs, equality and mutual benefit, peaceful co-existence.

But so wild and unmapped was the country that it took the Indians a year to find out that Wu-Je was a place the Indians call Bara Hoti.

Early Dealings Backfire

Now Nehru's trust in Red China has backfired, he is caught in some of his own earlier dealings.

He now says that the Chinese tacitly had recognized the so-called McMahon line, a border line negotiated in 1914 by Sir Henry McMahon, a representative of Britain, which established India's border with Tibet.

The Reds say, truthfully, that China never formally ratified that accord. But, meanwhile, from Nehru's flank comes Tibet's ousted Dalai Lama. He says that when India recognized a border with Tibet, it also recognized an independent nation. And that therefore Nehru cannot logically oppose Tibet's case against Red China in the United Nations. As of now, Nehru does oppose it.

Steel Wage Talks Back In Motion

NEW YORK (UPI)—Union and of 12 strikebound steel companies opened negotiations on local issues today, but their work is expected to have little effect on the steel strike impasse.

The auxiliary contract talks at the company level were begun at a midtown hotel this morning as the result of a plan adopted last week by the United Steelworkers Union and the companies to expand their negotiations.

The new negotiating teams were expected to make little progress as long as the union and the companies refuse to budge from their entrenched positions at the national negotiating level. Even President Eisenhower's plea on Tuesday for an end to "half-hearted bargaining" failed to change the static strike picture.

The chief executive officers of the big 12 steel firms sent a telegram to Eisenhower Wednesday night in which they blamed the union's refusal to accept two industry principles for the deadlock in negotiations. They said the principles were industry's battle to stop inflation and to operate on a more efficient basis.

"While paying lip service to the desirability of retarding inflation, they (the union) have repeatedly demonstrated a firm belief that inflation is a healthy ingredient of our economy," the message said.

The steel executives turned down a request by Steelworkers' President David J. McDonald for face-to-face negotiations with the chief executives of the steel companies. They emphasized, however, that the four-man negotiating team headed by R. Conrad Cooper has "full authority" to negotiate a settlement within the companies' principles.

The strike of 500,000 steel workers began 58 days ago. According to Labor Department figures issued in Washington, the strike has resulted in the lay-off of another 150,000 workers in steel-related industries, 50,000 more than reported a month ago.

Coexistence Key Plank

The latter point was and is a key plank in world-wide Communism's propaganda platform.

Now it is learned that in the same year Nehru and the Chinese signed their pact, there began a series of increasingly irritated notes over which nation owned what along the long border separating India and its protectorates from Red China.

As long as 10 years ago, Red Chinese maps were showing areas of India or its protectorates, Sikkim and Bhutan, as Chinese territory.

In 1954, the Chinese complained that 30 armed Indian troops had taken possession of Chinese territory at "Wu-Je" in the Tibetan area.
