

Rugged Mediterranean Island Tough Background For Movie

HOLLYWOOD (UPI) — Not since Ingrid Bergman and Roberto Rossellini filmed "Stromboli" has a movie company suffered the hardships encountered in a new German picture filmed on a rocky Mediterranean island.

One of the survivors, actor Cliff Robertson, returned to Hollywood this week looking like a refugee from a prison camp.

During the 17-week shooting schedule Cliff was knocked out with fever, lost weight and found working conditions all but impossible.

"The island was the size of three city blocks," Cliff said. "I lived in an adobe hut which was part of the set we were using in the picture. And the cast and crew were limited to a single pan of water each—for drinking, cooking and shaving."

Language Poses Problem
"There were no trees, grass or any sign of life among the rocks except for lizards. And I'll be darned if I know what they lived on."

Locale of the film, "The Search for Chortefo," is Greece, but to save costs cameras were set up in Yugoslavia, including the small island off the Dalmatian coast.

Linguistically the picture was almost as bad as working conditions.

Robertson and Cameron Mitchell were the only Americans in the cast. Co-star Maria Schell and her director-husband Horst Hecher are German. About 100 Yugoslavian peasants played extras, the five stunt men were Italian, 80 crew members were German, and a couple of Frenchmen were signed on as cameramen.

"Now that I look back on it, the language problem was pretty funny. We all picked up a few words in the various tongues."
