ANN LANDERS

Answers Your Problems

Dear Ann: You may or may not have settled the argument in your column on whether or not to visit sick people in hospitals, but your opinion may save a life or two—if people will listen.

I am a nurse who has had to deal with this problem frequently—and it is a problem. The attitude that you must visit the sick makes ME sick. Folks who would benefit from company, (the aged or crippled, or disabled children confined for long periods) seldom get company. But Uncle Jake who had a coronary last week and Aunt Tess who had a baby this morning, are always surrounded by people who KNOW the patient wants to see THEM but no one else.

The teenage boy has the added hazard of ten giggling girls struggling to sit on his bed. He may be flattered, but they usually stay beyond the point where he's glad to have them.

When I was ill last year I did more entertaining in the hospital than when I was in good health at home.

The best policy is to send your hospitalized friend a card or a note saying "I won't come to see you unless you send word and ask me."—R.N.

Dear R.N.: Thank you for a useful letter from someone who has been on both sides of the hypodermic needle. I agree that hospital visits should be by invitation only.

Dear Ann: My problem is different from any I've ever read in your column. I'm a girl, 17, and got my first job during Christmas vacation. I found it easy to steal a few articles from the store I worked in. I got caught and was fired.

My employer never told anyone, but he must have put it on my record because I can't get another part time job. I've learned my lesson and I'd never take anything that didn't belong to me again. But how can I prove myself if no one will have faith in me? Please tell me how to get another chance.—Untrusting Teen.

Dear Untrusting: I doubt your employer put this information on your record. Part time jobs are hard to get which is probably why you're having trouble. Go to your former employer, however, and ask him. If it is on your record, plead for another chance and ask him to remove it. I hope he gives you the chance.
