Expert Rates Stars To Give True Worth

CHICAGO (UPI) — An efficiency expert said today he has developed a method of rating baseball players to give a truer picture of their worth than the time-honored system of batting and fielding averages.

Alfred J. Bohl, a one-time minor league first baseman and now chief engineer for a Chicago management firm, said there is "plenty of other things wrong" with the current methods particularly its failure to discredit a player for "bonehead" plays.

Would Measure Misplays — The present system has no way of measuring boners, misplays and hitting or bunting into double plays. The players, of course, get credit for base hits, singles, doubles, triples or home runs, and for runs batted in, runs scored and stolen bases, but to what extent has this offensive play contributed to the scoring of runs, the basis of which games are won? Bohl said.

The efficiency expert said his "point rating system" will remedy these faults, making it easier for the fans to learn a player's value, and especially for the club owners who need a better guide for salary payment, he said.

Bohl's basic principle is to credit the player in points for his contribution to the scoring of runs, and, conversely, to charge the player when his play results in a loss of potential runs.
