'Connecticut Yankees' Told To Watch Manners Overseas

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The State Department has this bit of advice for anyone traveling abroad: Don't get into trouble. Once you're in, the department says, there's not much that can be done to get you out. Other countries have standards of justice that are not always the same as those in the United States.

State Department officials emphasized that an American visiting a foreign country must acquaint himself with the laws of that nation and understand that he cannot expect exactly the same treatment he might get at home. An example, they said, are traffic codes in Mexico. These laws are stiff, more so than in this country, and violators are usually jailed until trial, which may be delayed for days.

Follow Routine Procedure The department follows a routine procedure once an American is arrested. In every case where the U.S. citizen applies to a consular official for help, the official gathers the facts in the case, reports them to the State Department and appraises it from the legal standards of the foreign country. This is what is being done in the case of Miami Herald reporter James Buchanan, arrested in Havana on a charge that he aided the prison escape of American Austin Young. Young had been sentenced to 30 years by the Fidel Castro government for anti-Castro activity.

The State Department emphasized that a trial must be judged by the standards in the foreign country itself, rather than on U.S. standards. The United States tries foreign citizens under U.S. codes when they break the law. No Automatic Appeal If there is a gross miscarriage of justice in the foreign trial of an American, the U.S. government can make a representation and ask that the foreign government lighten the sentence or give some other relief. However, American officials emphasized that each case must be decided on the circumstances involved and there is no automatic U.S. government appeal.

As a matter of fact, officials said, Americans generally have fared better in trials abroad than do foreign nationals convicted of the same crime.

Nehru Stands Calm Surrounded By Difficulties Of The Times

By PHIL NEWSOM UPI Staff Writer

The influential Times of India not long ago thumbed Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru this way:

"At one time he had a solution to every difficulty; today he faces a difficulty in every solution."

It was an apt description of Nehru, who in 1954 signed the five principles of peaceful co-existence with Red China and today finds himself embroiled in a border dispute with Red China piling upon him woes deeper than the Himalayan snows.

In recent days these have been Nehru statements of position:

In a letter replying to Red Chinese Premier Chou En-lai's proposal that they meet Dec. 26 to negotiate either in China or Rangoon, Burma:

"I find it quite impossible to go to Rangoon or any other place within the next few days."

Negotiate, Negotiate, Negotiate In Parliament:

"We will negotiate and negotiate and negotiate to the bitter end."

On a CBS television broadcast: "I don't think, however strong China may be, it will succeed in conquering India." For centuries the Chinese have regarded themselves as a superior race, an opinion "more Chinese than Communist."

Together they help to create the picture of a confused and harried man caught in the web of his own neutralism, facing a problem for which he himself sees no solution, and leading additional force to the further comment by the Times of India:

"As the years rolled by the very foundation on which Nehru's prestige and reputation rested began to wear him down."

Nehru has run head-on into a cynicism for which his philosophy leaves him ill-prepared.

It was this same sort of Communist cynicism which once led the late Josef Stalin to reply to a warning about the world influence of the Roman Catholic Pope:

"How many divisions has the Pope?"

So as Chou En-lai reads Nehru's statements and sees him take a firm stand on both sides of the fence, he also may inquire:

"How many divisions has Nehru?"

Few Against Many

Nehru himself has admitted he does not presently have enough—perhaps 20,000 men against five million.

Before his own Parliament Nehru is committed to defend India's borders, but his defense must be to "negotiate and negotiate and negotiate." Hoping for a Red Chinese truce, he himself does not expect.

For, once more in his own words, he knows that China never in history has recognized any loss of territory, surrendering it perhaps in periods of weakness but always regarding the loss as strictly temporary.

In his reply to Chou En-lai, Nehru "regretted" that the Red position will be based on invasion of traditional Indian territory.

But against him is the coldly logical Chou En-lai who pointed out that the Chinese built a road and for nearly 10 years controlled such territory without Nehru even being aware of it.
