

Son is consumed by regret over treatment of his father

DEAR ABBY: I brought my 68-year-old immigrant father to live with me permanently with the intention of caring for him. He was completely dependent. Halfway through the year, I got angry, told him to move back and vowed to myself I would never ever care for him again. It wasn't that he did anything wrong; I don't know why I got so angry. He wound up living alone, being helped by his friends. I knew he was suffering, but I couldn't bring myself to bring him back to live with me. I was cruel, and it hurt him. I let his green card lapse. He died two years later. Since then, I have been overwhelmed with guilt. I should have cared for my father. I am depressed over my actions. Please tell me how I can move forward. —GUILT-RIDDEN

RIDDEN: Performing the role of caregiver is an enormous undertaking. While it can be rewarding, it can also be exhausting, unremitting and stressful. Caregivers have been known to lose their tempers because of the pressure. Please consider scheduling some appointments with a licensed mental health professional who can help you more fully understand what happened between you and your father and help you cope with your guilt. And in the future — once you are able — consider atoning by volunteering for a charity that serves the elderly. DEAR ABBY: I have been married to a functioning alcoholic for more than 30 years. He was once funny and nice and a good dad. But over the years he has become unbearable to live with. He doesn't shower or brush his teeth. He was always mainly a beer drinker, but now he is drinking hard liquor and stays drunk most of the time. I told him he's a severe alcoholic, and he should talk to his doctor, but he refuses. I am pretty sure he is drinking on the job. —LOST can get away with having such poor hygiene and being drunk at work. Because he refuses to talk to his doctor about this, you should. I hope you realize that you cannot "save" him. Historical remains found during construction reburied in NYC

NEW YORK — Human remains of early New Yorkers that were discovered during construction in and around Washington Square Park were reinterred inside the park on Tuesday, March 2, New York City officials announced.

Green-Wood Cemetery volunteers rebury the fragmentary remains of early New Yorkers found during construction in and around Washington Square Park, Tuesday, March 2, 2021, in New York. The human remains were placed in the wooden box and buried 5 feet below ground within a planting bed in the park and marked with an engraved paver.

Sarah Carroll, chair of the landmarks panel, thanked the Parks Department "for ensuring that archaeology was appropriately completed, and the human remains were respectfully treated throughout the process." Washington Square Park in Manhattan's Greenwich Village neighborhood was constructed in the 1850s at the site of a former potter's field. Thousands of people were buried there between 1797 and 1825, officials said. The partial remains that were reinterred on Tuesday were placed in a wooden box and buried in a planting bed with an engraved paving stone marking the spot, Parks Department officials said. Because the remains were fragmentary, forensic analysis did not yield details about the individuals, the officials said. —Associated Press
