Get on board to truly make a difference

Listen, I know you’re busy. Things truly continue to be so hard — just, generally hard. It’s difficult to find extra time to take on additional work, projects or anything. It’s even difficult to find the energy sometimes to commit to one more thing. I get it; I’ve been telling myself the same thing.

I won’t lie — there are definitely times I find myself whining or complaining about all of the sacrificed hours given to volunteering for an organization’s board of directors. There is always a constant barrage of emails, volunteers for tasks to be rounded up, or projects to take on. There always seems to be endless meetings, which feel like they do nothing more than result in scheduling another meeting. There are definitely always the days when I walk away thinking to myself how I have my own work to do and can’t take on the work of something else.

But there are also the days, after a long work session or huge project is complete, you simmer in satisfaction with your cohorts. You develop deep bonds with other people — people whom you might have never come across in your regular day-to-day life. It’s not always glorious moments of classy afternoon tea with those little sandwiches and edible flowers, no. I have fallen asleep leaning back-to-back with another volunteer as we prepared to embrace the late shift of a major event. There have been times we’ve wrestled with cleaning up broken, overflowing garbage bags. There are the other times meetings run so late in the evening and start so early in the morning, days will go by in between seeing friends and family.

Now, anyone who knows me knows how I love to write. I even volunteer to take meeting minutes all day long (just promise to look for the “Easter eggs” I leave behind — writing is always worth it when it’s fun). But, when I sat down to think about “board service” and how to enumerate what it means — why it’s important — it was so hard to put into words. Joining, serving and volunteering for an organization’s board of LA GRANDE — A La Grande focal point has been given new life.

Jeanne and David Williamson purchased the historic building at the corner of Washington Avenue and Depot Street on Friday, Aug. 20. The La Grande couple plan on running their labeling business on the first floor of the former Elks Lodge and using the rest of the space for community events.

“We’re really excited about it,” Jeanne Williamson said. “For the last few years, I’ve been looking at that building and it’s just been driving me nuts.”

The Williamsons own Evermine, a Portland-based custom labeling company that ships across the country and overseas. The duo travel back and forth to Portland, but spend most of their time in La Grande since moving to the area three years ago.

The couple have big plans for the big building, most recently the home of the Maridell Center, but the projects may take a number of years. The initial plan is to move Evermine from Portland to La Grande, utilizing the first floor as production and office space. The Williamsons intend to renovate the ballroom on the top story of the building, as well as bring new life to the basement area.

Heading east

The Williamsons have owned Evermine for 20 years, keeping residence in the Portland area for most of that time. After falling in love with La Grande, they are looking to fully move to the city and bring their company along with them.

There are several roadblocks currently in the way, such as gaining permission from the city, figuring out staffing and adjusting the company’s shipping. The business moving to La Grande could open up new job opportunities in the area, which David Williamson says is a major goal.

“We have roughly 20 employees and we could anticipate about a third of them would move over here, another third that would work remotely and the other third would likely be local hires,” he said.

Farm-related business sweats because of drought

ENTERPRISE — In a year when farmers are hurting because of the drought, related businesses also are feeling the heat as producers are struggling to harvest the meager crops that shippers such as Farm Supply take to market.

“It’s a year like no other,” co-owner Craig Willis said. “The harvest this year, as near as we can tell, is about 65% of normal in Umatilla County. It’s just getting going here (in Wallowa County), but I’m sure it’ll be affected here also.”

Farm Supply not only ships grain to market, but hauls fuel, chips, fertilizer, logs, cattle and nearly every commodity grown in the Northwest. The company, which Willis owns and operates with his wife, Candi, ships throughout Oregon, Idaho, Washington, Utah and Northern California.

“We haul ag commodities everywhere,” Craig said.

“If it fits, it ships,” quipped daughter Kylie.

Craig is even seeing ranchers shipping their livestock early, moving them from summer to winter pasture earlier or to feedlots.

“Normally, we don’t haul a lot of cattle this time of year, but this year ranchers are getting them off of pasture or moving to different pastures” because of the drought, he said.

“We’re doing a lot of cattle shuffling.”

In addition to Craig and Candi Willis, Kylie helps out in the office and her husband, Klint, drives truck part and takes care of the cows, while Craig and Candi’s son, Skyler, and his wife, Amber, take care of most of the farming.

Farm Supply has about 55 employees, 50 of whom are drivers of their 50 trucks. Most of the others are mechanics who keep the trucks operating, as do some mechanics the company contracts with.

“We are thankful for the employees we have and couldn’t provide great service without them,” Candi said.

The Willises have owned the business since 2004. Craig went to work there in 1977, but the company dates to 1938.

“It’s an old, old company,” Craig said. “I used to drive a lot. I drove every day for 32 years before I bought the company, and then I continued to drive and dispatch trucks as we built the company until about 2010.”

“Now he just has to be within phone range because he’s on the phone all the time,” Candi said.

The Willises both are
