

Niece still hasn't paid back loan for legal bill

DEAR ABBY
ADVICE

DEAR ABBY: Several years ago, my adult niece, with whom I am very close, found herself in some legal difficulties and needed an attorney. At the time, due to some medical issues, she wasn't working and could not afford the attorney's retainer, so I offered to lend her the money. I told her she could repay me once she began working again.

Nine months later she sent me a check for $500 and, two months after that, another one for $500. The retainer was $2,600. My niece has been steadily employed for the last two years, yet I have received no further payment. I regret that I didn't set up a formal repayment plan, but I never dreamed she'd default on the loan.

Her mother told me she is saving up to buy a house and, apparently, she has money to spend on friends and others. I never told her parents that I loaned her the money, and I have no idea if she ever did, although I assume she hasn't. I'm torn between approaching my niece to remind her that the loan has not yet been repaid and risk damaging the relationship we have, or suck it up and accept that I'll never see the money.

Because of the pandemic, my husband has been out of work for many months. While we are not desperate, the money she owes me could be put to good use. Please advise. — GOOD DEED IN THE MIDWEST

DEAR GOOD DEED: Meet with or contact your niece to ask her for the money she still owes you and, when you do, explain that your husband hasn't worked in many months and you need it. Agree upon a repayment plan. However, if she reneges again, DO discuss it with her parents.

Perhaps they can "encourage" their daughter to do the right thing. There must be a reason they didn't front her the money for her legal problem. Let's hope it wasn't because she stiffed them, too.

DEAR ABBY: A female relative wants to have a child. She is 30. However, her significant other of six years hasn't proposed. She feels her biological clock is ticking — loudly. What would you suggest family advise her to do?

I feel that a woman who wants a child should have one if she can afford to, regardless of whether or not she's married. But I understand her preferring to be married first. Time is running out on the likelihood of developing a new relationship this late in the process. What's a girl to do? — WONDERING IN OHIO

DEAR WONDERING: The "girl" should ask her boyfriend of six years if he wants to be married to her. If the answer is yes, and he wants to be a father, her problem will be solved. However, if the answer is no — and she can afford it — she should proceed on her path to motherhood without him. Someone may come into her life later who would love to be a husband and a dad. And, if not, she will have fulfilled her biological imperative.

Walla Walla hunter remembers the era of the hunting hound

By EMRY DINMAN
Walla Walla Union-Bulletin

WALLA WALLA — On a cold January morning, the snow from a recent storm largely melted, Brian Hergert sat inside the living room of his cozy Walla Walla home, surrounded by houseplants in every corner and furnishings he's fashioned out of antlers and animal hides.

In a few hours, he would be headed to his property out in the country, ready to be back in nature after staying home for a few days. Outside, two coonhounds, Maisie and Tracker, howl at newcomers and passing cats before curling up again for a nap inside their chain-link kennel.

An avid hunter, Hergert has been running hounds since the early '80s. Before the practice was largely banned by voters more than a decade later, his hounds often helped him hunt big game predators, including cougars, in the Blue Mountains.

"We used to take, in a good year, I'd kill six, seven cats," Hergert said. "It was nothing to take out 40, 50 cats out of the Blues from here to Dayton between me and my friends."

In 1996, however, Washington state joined Oregon in outlawing the use of hounds to hunt or pursue black bear, cougars or bobcats, with some exceptions. That initiative, which also largely criminalized the use of bait to attract black bears, was approved by Washington voters by a comfortable margin, marking what many saw as a sea change for hunters in the state.

predators has remained politically contentious in the decades since, often flared by increased human-cougar interactions, livestock predation and rare but high-profile fatal attacks.

But recently, debate over what to do with cougars in the Blue Mountains in particular has increased for a different reason: dwindling elk populations.

The Blue Mountain elk herd is estimated to consist of around 3,500 animals, according to reporting by the Lewiston Tribune, well below the population objective of 5,500 currently set by the Washington Department of Fish & Wildlife.

The herd's calves also often are not surviving to maturity.

A 2021 study by the Washington Department of Fish & Wildlife monitored 125 elk calves with radio collars — by mid-November, only 11 still were known to be alive. While a number of factors such as a recent harsh winter and drought have contributed to the high mortality rate, cougars are believed to have accounted for 54 of those deaths.

While some have called for reducing elk hunting in the area to protect the herd, the study's findings have prompted calls to extend cougar-hunting season in the Blue Mountains as well as for the Fish & Wildlife to use hounds to hunt the big cats for management purposes, which is allowed under the 1996 law.

For Hergert, calls to increase cougar hunting are long overdue.

Hergert's hounds

While the veteran hunter has owned as many as six hunting dogs at one time, these days he just keeps the two: a redtick-treering walker mix named Maisie, and a redtick-bluetick mix named Tracker.

Hergert grew up hunting birds with his dad and brother, and when he began using hounds, he started with small game. He had permission to run his dogs through the ditches alongside farm ground out near Waitsburg and elsewhere, chasing down raccoons.

"But they're just kind of greasy, stinky deals," Hergert said. "But big cats, they're good eating."

It wasn't long before Hergert began training hounds to chase bobcats and cougars. And if friends who hunted big cats were only interested in the pelt, he'd take the meat and trim it down with the help of a butcher his father worked with as a high schooler.

When Hergert first started hunting cougars, anyone could buy the hunting license and tag and could use hounds during the hunt, he said. Later, the state used a lottery system to allocate cougar tags, and Hergert's name had to be drawn for him to be able to harvest a cougar.

Or, as often as not, another hunter whose name was drawn that year would reach out to Hergert, knowing that he had trained hunting hounds that needed to keep their skills sharp.

Once his hounds found a cougar's trail and chased it, the cougar would typically climb a tree to try to escape, unable to maintain fast speeds at long distances. While Hergert caught up with his dogs, their baying at the bottom of the tree kept the cougar from being able to flee again.

While the 1996 initiative to ban the use of hounds for hunting cougars and other large predators ended the recreational sport, it didn't end the hunt altogether.

The law provided for a number of exceptions, including for population management or to kill an animal that had attacked livestock or threatened public safety, though hunters generally need authorization from the state.

And in recent years, the elk that he hunts have become more inaccessible.

"There were 28 rifle-hunting permits available for bull elk in 2018," Hergert said.

"Now there's one permit for rifle and one permit for archery, for the whole area. It's really that bad," he said.

Now, to save the elk populations and to increase opportunities for area hunters, Hergert argues, restrictions on hunting cougars need to be relaxed.

But while Hergert and other individual hunters are not the only ones calling for cougar hunting guidelines to be relaxed in the face of high elk calf predation, it is not a proposal without political challenges and controversy.
