

EELS

Both sexes of Pacific lamprey build a nest in sandy gravel via body vibrations and by moving small rocks with their mouth.

An adult lamprey uses its suckling mouth to attach to river cobble prior to spawning.

Lampreys the size of a small garter snake emerge from their burrow and begin a lengthy, danger-fraught journey to the Pacific Ocean under the cover of spring freshets.

Adult Pacific lamprey have no value to sport anglers (except for use as sturgeon bait). However, they are part of the food web for sea lion, white sturgeon and fish-eating birds.

going lamprey contribute ocean-derived nutrients to tributary streams.

Coincident with hydroelectric dam development in the Columbia River, numbers of adult lampreys migrating over Bonneville Dam declined from 350,000 in the 1960s to 22,000 in 1997.

1960s. Loss of critical tributary habitat from poor irrigation practices, deforestation, grazing, and treatment with rotenone to poison "trash fish" added to the toll.

Regional Indian tribes and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service lead conservation efforts to restore runs of Pacific lamprey populations. Lampreys dried in the sun or roasted over wood coals are considered a delicacy by tribal elders.

bers of returning fish have been large enough to support a modest subsistence fishery for tribal members.

The anthropologist Eugene Hunn wrote how Sahaptin-speaking peoples from the mid-Columbia intercepted a spawning run of "eels" during a 19th century spring root-gathering excursion up the John Day River.

The Wanapum Tribe tells of an important fishery near Pasco, Washington, a location referred to as Kosith or "at the point of land."

The Snake River near Asotin, Washington, was another traditional harvest location for Indian fishers.

Commission described the occurrence of this revered "three-toothed" lamprey as far upriver as Lower Salmon Falls.

Dark clouds loom overhead. Behind me, on a shoreline lined with brush willow, a redwing blackbird struggles to balance on a branch that sways with each gust of wind.

The ancient night eel has survived against all odds for thousands of years. Bearing witness to their return assures the circle of life is not broken.

HOROSCOPES by Stella Wilder

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 2022 YOUR BIRTHDAY by Stella Wilder Born today, you are a born explorer, a curious type who is always looking behind doors and under carpets to see what's lurking about out of sight and, usually, out of mind.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) -- Your native intelligence always serves you well, but take care that you are also allowing your heart to play a part. How do you feel today? VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) -- You may have to come up with a reason for something that had none when you did it -- because today you're likely to be asked for an explanation.

Someone you know and love is likely going through a hard time, and it's going to be up to you today to reach out and express concern. AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) -- Morning activities may be scrutinized by the powers that be, but what you do in the afternoon will not be studied so closely. Enjoy yourself! PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) -- You may be recognized for a recent contribution that you had no idea was quite so important or noteworthy. Can you repeat yourself? ARIES (March 21-April 19) -- You and someone you know quite well may not understand each other for a time today -- until you realize and eliminate what's causing confusion. TAURUS (April 20-May 20) -- You can give someone new an honest critique without hurting any feelings today. When this is done, you may want to join in the effort yourself.
