Why we should be worried about fentanyl

Drug overdose death in Oregon more than doubled from 2019 to 2021. The number of overdose deaths from opioids alone more than doubled — from 280 to at least 656. It was mostly due to the synthetic opioid fentanyl.

How can you read that announcement from the Oregon Health Authority and think what we are doing is working?

Some of the increase in overdoses is believed to be due to the social isolation and economic dislocation from the pandemic. But there is also an increasing availability of fentanyl.

The Oregon-Idaho High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area said in April 40% of all counterfeit pills in circulation contain fatal amounts of fentanyl.

The Oregon Health Authority seems to be doing good things. It's letting everyone know about the problem. It's doing its best to ensure people have access to naloxone. That is what is called a rescue drug. Give somebody a shot of naloxone when they have an opioid overdose and it's likely to save them. The state is also working to implement a mapping program that provides real time overdose updates to local communities.

Some people will try drugs and get addicted. If you have known someone struggling with addiction, you know it's not as simple as asking them to stop. So there are efforts to educate drug users.

They are told to assume pills they get have fentanyl unless the person who handed it to them was a pharmacist. They are told not to use drugs alone and keep naloxone around and visible if they do use drugs. Fentanyl test strips are made available.

But here are two ideas. Naloxone may or may not be covered by health insurance. Coupons can be found online to help lower the cost. Should Oregon require health insurance to cover naloxone?

And second, we may sound like a broken record on this, but we can't help but think Measure 110 may not have been constructed quite right.

That was the ballot measure that decriminalized possession of small amounts of drugs, such as heroin and methamphetamine. The measure also took marijuana tax revenue and funneled it into more drug treatment.

More treatment works best if people have something getting them into treatment. Measure 110 makes it easier than before for people who are caught in possession of drugs to avoid treatment.

That isn't good.

Compromise only goes so far

RYNDA CLARK & MATHIEU FEDERSPIEL
OTHER VIEWS

Earlier this month, our organizations joined with our allies and went to court to restore protections for large trees in Eastern Oregon. The editors of this paper argued it represented failure on all sides. We agree. To a point.

Anytime we go to court, it is the result of failure. In this case, it was the Forest Service's failure to abide by the law. A fundamental concept of our democracy is that no one — not even the government — is above the law. Regardless of their means, citizens have a right to hold their government accountable.

Our primary concern is for the health of our forests and communities. We support some thinning near communities and appropriate restoration of forests that have been degraded by fire suppression, logging and over-grazing. None of those things require cutting our biggest and oldest trees or logging the backcountry.

When a political appointee signed a decision to undermine decades old protections for our forests, it capped off a politically driven process. It also cut sovereign tribes and the general public off from legally required opportunities to seek a better outcome.

Left with no choice but to allow the illegally amended rule to stand or challenge it in court, we chose to fight for our forests and our rights. Had the substance of the decision been different, we'd fully expect the logging industry to do the same.

We understand there are other perspectives out there. While we find their rhetoric misleading, we acknowledge the logging industry has a right to free speech and to use their political clout to increase their profits.

The real failure is with the Forest Service, which failed to honor commitments made more than two decades ago.

Supporters of the new rules that allow logging the largest 3% of trees often tell the half-truth that they replaced protections that were meant to be temporary. They don't mention those protections were meant to be temporary until the agency crafted comprehensive rules that would take all interests into account — including those of us who advocate for clean water, wildlife habitat and healthy communities. That never happened.

The agency regularly made exceptions to the rules. Sometimes with our support.

When we learned the Trump administration was changing the rules, we were skeptical. Still, we participated in good faith. Just as the editors suggested, we sat down and offered compromises and proposals we thought could lead to a good outcome.

However, those olive branches were brushed aside. During a period of historic conflict and distraction, and under tremendous political pressure, the agency pushed toward a predetermined outcome.

That outcome was opposed by dozens of conservation, climate, Indigenous and public health groups, thousands of citizens, 115 independent scientists, and even former Forest Service leadership.

We played by the rules. The agency did not.

So, when a political appointee ended the process by signing a decision that violated numerous laws, we were left with little choice but to exercise our constitutional rights and stand up to our own government.

We join the editors in wanting to see compromise from all sides and a better path forward. We also agree that Sen. Wyden has a history of bringing folks together as he did with his East Side forest bill years ago.

For that to happen again, protections must be restored, with the goal of working toward a viable solution. We'll be waiting at the table.
