

Jealousy undermines woman's relationship with retiree

DEAR ABBY
ADVICE

DEAR ABBY: I've been in a "friend with benefits" relationship for more than a year now. I'm 57 and he's 79. I was raised a Christian and wanted to save myself for marriage. This is the first time I have loved someone and been the FWB. I'm jealous of his last girlfriend and what they had together. She wanted to get married, and he didn't.

A woman at my church says I ought to just remain friends with him and pray God will send me a man who will love and marry me. This is a retirement town. There aren't many available men my age. I feel guilty because I went against my Christian faith. I'd appreciate your advice. — IN LIMBO IN ARIZONA

DEAR IN LIMBO: Why are you wasting your time being jealous of his ex-girlfriend? They are history. The odds of you changing this man's mind on the subject of marriage are not good, but you know that from the beginning. The guilt you're carrying may be the price you pay for whatever pleasure this relationship brings you.

Since pickings are so slim in your community, please note that I'm not telling you to end it. However, if the situation becomes increasingly painful, that's what you should do. Because you are deeply religious, this may be a subject to discuss with your religious adviser.

DEAR ABBY: Five years ago, our son was arrested for child porn. At the time, he was responsible for running our family business. When he was sent to prison for two years, we realized he had been running it into the ground, plus stealing as much as he could. We have not spoken since. Our grandson is now being married, and he wants us to attend.

We haven't spoken to our grandson or his father since all this happened. Must we attend

this wedding? — BAD BLOOD IN FLORIDA

DEAR BAD BLOOD: It would be unfair to shun your grandson for the sins of his father. Must you attend the wedding? No. Should you go? I think so. When you do, be cordial to your son. You do not have to see him often or at all after that, but keep in mind there may be other family celebrations in the future.

DEAR ABBY: I have a best friend of 15 years. (We even got matching tattoos.) However, I feel like I'm always put on the back burner. I'm easygoing, so maybe she feels she doesn't need to be a good friend in return? I understand we all have busy lives, but there are 24 hours in a day and seven days in a week. It doesn't take but a minute to send a text to ask how I'm doing. Am I being unrealistic for wanting a friendship that goes both ways? — LOST IN A FRIENDSHIP

DEAR LOST: It is only unrealistic if you have spoken to your longtime friend about how you feel (15 years late) and she's unwilling to expend a little more effort in your direction. I recommend you have that long-overdue conversation with her and let her know what your needs are.

SURVEY

In the survey, 33% of Oregonians said that they at least partially agreed that the reason employers have had difficulty filling jobs is because since the COVID lockdowns, "people have gotten used to not working and are continuing to live off savings and unemployment benefits and are not feeling a sense of urgency to work."

Unemployment benefits were expanded during the height of the pandemic, but have since shrunk back. Laid-off workers, who pay into unemployment insurance through payroll, can receive roughly 65% of their weekly wages when unemployed. A person working 40 hours a week at minimum wage could receive around $350 per week if laid off. The additional weekly payments approved by the federal government — initially $600 and then $300 — ended in September 2021.

People receiving unemployment benefits typically have to demonstrate that they are searching for employment. The work search requirement was suspended during the height of the pandemic, but reinstated more than a year ago.

One in five Oregon workers switched to remote or hybrid work during the pandemic.

Workers who make $100,000 or more were three times more likely than workers making less than $50,000 to have the flexibility to work from home or go into the office, the survey found.

One in four workers making less than $50,000 had to go on unemployment at some point during the past two years. Just one in 10 workers making $100,000 or more went on unemployment.

Still, 38% of working Oregonians said that nothing had changed in their employment in the past two years.

Sienna Fitzpatrick was halfway through a year-long AmeriCorps program in Central Oregon when the pandemic hit. Despite the pandemic, Fitzpatrick was hired on as a full-time employee in September 2020.

Fitzpatrick's organization went to remote work during the pandemic and only returned back to the office this spring.

"We had a lot of really long and sometimes kind of tense discussions as a department," about the return to the office, Fitzpatrick said, which resulted in a hybrid schedule that has had increased flexibility when needed, like for a coworker struggling to find consistent childcare.

DILLON

The agency was unable to find the vast majority of 1,000 "ghost workers" supposedly identified by its hourly harvest formula, which farmers claimed was arbitrarily and inaccurately calculated.

"The precedent was super important for anyone who has labor," he said. "There was a lot of interest nationally in what was happening. We weren't just carrying the torch for Oregon producers. It had a lot of importance to the broader ag community."

The episode taught a valuable lesson to overzealous, "out-of-control" federal employees, Dillon said. "We see what you're doing and there are mechanisms for us to correct what you're doing. And you really shouldn't do it again."

Though he doesn't come from an agricultural background, Dillon said he felt a kinship with farmers and ranchers while working as a staffer in the 1990s for U.S. Sen. Bob Packwood, R-Ore.

He was eager to build on those relationships upon accepting a job as the Oregon Farm Bureau's communications director, which led to his hiring for the top position in 2002.

"I felt a connection with producers," Dillon said. "They're very pragmatic and want to get stuff done."

OASIS

"A wine-and-dine kind of place," he said. "Come hang out, cool off, check it out, watch some TV."

Tia said when they do reopen, they'll be keeping the same menu the Vails had when they closed. Then, modifications could be in the works.

"We'll talk to customers and see what they like and what they want and what we can feasibly do," she said.

Overnight

In addition to the cabins they now have, they're planning something a little different — geodesic domes as overnight accommodations.

Tia called the domes "a different, unique way to stay here." For those who want to be more in the outdoors, there's also camping across the road at the river access owned by the Washington

Department of Fish and Wildlife.

Outdoors

In addition to serving as a fishing guide, Louis plans to have a hunting guide available. He has hunted big game in Alaska, but not yet in Washington, so he's leaving the guiding to a contractor.

But Boggans will be selling hunting and fishing licenses, as well as Discover passes, which are required for vehicle access to state parks and recreation lands managed by the state.

Wallowa County connection

Just five miles from Oregon, the Villagomezes look forward to getting to know their neighbors in Wallowa County. They said they hope to sell pies from one of the bakeries in Enterprise and to learn more about the Nez Perce Tribe and its ties to the land here.

"I'm big on all things Native American," Louis said.

With all they've had to do to get Boggans ready to open, they haven't had time to explore Wallowa County yet, but they plan to.

Their kids, too, are eager to start school in Troy. Gabriel, a 10-year-old fifth-grader, and Graciella, a second-grader who's almost 7, will make up half of the schools student body as soon as their parents obtain a cross-state waiver.

"We kind of feel an obligation to enroll our kids there," Tia said.
