

Log prices expected to stabilize, experts say

VANCOUVER, Wash. — Log markets probably won’t fluctuate as wildly in 2020 as during the past few years, but the Northwest timber industry can expect political volatility, experts say.

The average price for Douglas fir sawmill logs shot up from roughly $650 per thousand board-feet in early 2017 to $850 per thousand board-feet in early 2018.

After maintaining that level for more than half a year, the average price plunged below $650 per thousand board-feet by the summer of 2019 and has since risen slightly, according to the Fastmarkets RISI market intelligence firm.

“We know what goes up must come down,” said Steve Courtney, director of solid wood procurement at Roseburg Forest Products. “Remember how good it was, because the hangover has been hell.”

Log prices were depressed in 2019 due to lower demand for lumber from lagging housing starts and poor weather during the building season, he said at the Western Forestry and Conservation Association’s Jan. 23 “Mapping the Course” conference in Vancouver, Wash.

Uncertainty about rising interest rates and the fears of a looming recession also likely contributed to gloomy markets last year, Courtney said.

Housing construction is expected to strengthen in 2020 but there’s an increased supply of logs from the Southern U.S. and log exports across the Pacific Ocean are expected to be subdued, he said.

“Overall, I think 2020 will be more positive than 2019, but you never know,” Courtney said, adding that turbulence in trade, labor, domestic politics and foreign relations will probably have an uncertain influence.

U.S. housing starts only increased by about 1% in 2019, but the building industry expects them to rise by about 4% in 2020 and 2% in 2021, according to Hamir Patel, an analyst at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

To compare, housing starts grew by about 3% in 2017 and in 2018.

For sawmills, the decline in lumber prices has eaten deeply into profits, forcing them to cut shifts and production, said Hakan Ekstrom, principal of the Wood Resources International consulting firm.

“We’ve seen some dramatic reductions in prices over the last 18 months,” he said. “For many sawmills, it’s too low to run. Things have changed a lot.”

Tim Newkirk recognized as Nut Grower of the Year

Farmer considered one of the youngest recipients of prestigious award

CORVALLIS, Ore. — Winners of the Nut Grower of the Year award tend to be “well-seasoned,” which isn’t surprising since award recognizes years of dedication to the hazelnut industry.

At 43 years old, Tim Newkirk of Canby, Ore., is considered one of the youngest farmers to win the prestigious title from the Nut Growers Society of Oregon, Washington and British Columbia.

“It typically takes a lifetime of work to achieve this award,” said Sean Denfeld, general manager of the Denfeld Packing company near Hillsboro, Ore.

Despite his relative youth, Newkirk has performed a vital role in educating new growers about hazelnut varieties, suitable pollinizers, tree spacing and irrigation methods since the planting boom began more than a decade ago, Denfeld said during the Jan. 16 annual winter meeting of the Nut Growers Society in Corvallis, Ore.

As the hazelnut industry has grown, Newkirk has become “arguably one of the most sought-after resources for advice” among other farmers, Denfeld said.

In accepting the award, Newkirk said he considered it a major honor in light of the achievements of past recipients.

“It’s hard for me to even think of being in this realm with them,” Newkirk said.

Newkirk currently sits on the board of the Oregon Hazelnut Commission, which steers industry research and promotion, and served on the board of the Nut Growers Society between 2008 and 2012, including a stint as its president in 2010.

Aside from sitting on “countless other sub-committees, steering committees and ad hoc groups,” Newkirk is also a participant in the Hazelnut Stewardship Project, which aims to measure and improve the industry’s environmental performance, Denfeld said.

He’s also the former CEO of Willamette Hazelnut Growers, a packing company in Newberg, Ore., and his family has been involved in Oregon State University’s hazelnut breeding program.

“I love the life I live, and I wish more people could live it,” Newkirk said.

Hazelnut impacts from China deal remain murky

While agreement is generally positive, specifics are unclear

By MATEUSZ PERKOWSKI

CORVALLIS, Ore. — While Oregon’s hazelnut industry stands to gain from the first phase of the Trump administration’s trade deal with China, the specifics remain shrouded in mystery.

China’s agreement to buy more agricultural goods from the U.S. amounts to a “purchase agreement” but it’s unclear exactly how that increase will be achieved, said Larry George, president of the George Packing Co., a major packer.

“We have to figure out how to talk to the Chinese government about how to get them to waive tariffs or do some kind of direct purchase,” George said. “We’re not sure exactly how it will work.”

Under “phase one” of the two-stage agreement, China has committed to increasing its purchases of U.S. farm products by $12.5 billion in 2020 and $19.5 billion in 2021 above a baseline amount established in 2017.

According to USDA, the U.S. shipped nearly $19.5 billion worth of agricultural products to China that year. In the wake of the trade dispute between the two countries, U.S. farm exports to China dropped by more than $10 billion in 2018.

Hazelnuts are harvested in an orchard near Salem, Ore. The specific impacts of a trade deal between the U.S. and China remain unclear for Oregon’s hazelnut industry, though the outlook is positive.

For the hazelnut industry, tariffs rose from 25% on in-shell nuts and 10% for shelled nuts to 65% and 50%, respectively.

While the trade deal has established minimum purchase amounts, it doesn’t actually state that tariffs on U.S. hazelnuts or any other farm products will be reduced, George said at the Jan. 16 Nut Growers Society winter meeting in Corvallis, Ore. “None of the big commodity groups got their tariffs lowered by the Chinese.”

It’s possible that hazelnuts and other agricultural commodities will have to apply for tariff waivers or that purchases of these crops will be subsidized by direct purchases from the Chinese government, he said.

At the moment, it’s unknown whether the process will last a couple months or a couple years, George said. “The question is how we get the attention of the Chinese government.”

Even so, the USDA, the U.S. Trade Representative and the U.S. State Department have all been highly supportive of the hazelnut industry in recent trade negotiations, George said.

An upside of the trade tensions is that Oregon’s hazelnut producers have opened the door for shipping their crops directly to China, rather than first funneling them through Hong Kong or Vietnam as part of a “gray market” to avoid tariffs, he said.

Aside from progress in China, the hazelnut industry will see tariffs drop to zero under a recent trade deal with Japan, and U.S. government agencies expect to negotiate with India’s government to eliminate its tariffs on the crop as well, George said. “We need to engage them on a regular basis and we’re seeing real progress.”

Despite the recent trade turbulence, prices for Oregon hazelnuts have improved after taking a steep plunge in 2018.

The initial field price set at the end of summer in 2019 rose to 83 cents per pound, up from 62 cents the previous year. Since then, the field prices have risen by 7 to 35 cents per pound, depending on the variety of hazelnut.

The market was particularly tough in 2018 because the value of Turkish currency had plunged against the U.S. dollar, allowing hazelnut producers in that country to out-compete Oregon growers, said Terry Ross, executive director of the Hazelnut Growers Bargaining Association.

“This by itself was enough to devastate our market,” he said.

Before the 2019 harvest, however, the global inventory of leftover hazelnuts was low, which has contributed to healthier prices, he said.

Turkey’s crop also doesn’t appear to be as large as expected and sales have been brisk thanks to growing demand, Ross said. “The price kept ticking up.”
