Water transfer pilot program extended until 2030

By MATEUSZ PERKOWSKI Capital Press

Water transfers within 15 Oregon irrigation districts will continue to be allowed without formal regulatory authorization under a pilot program that's been extended until 2030.

Prior to 2003, all temporary transfers of water rights within irrigation district boundaries had to be authorized by the state's Water Resources Department.

The requirement caused a backlog of applications that delayed transfer decisions beyond the irrigation season for farmers who needed to change their place

Those application requirements were waived under a pilot program that eventually grew from three irrigation districts to 15 and was extended until 2022.

Under Senate Bill 130, which recently passed the Legislature and was signed into law by Gov. Kate Brown, the pilot project will remain in effect for an additional eight years.

That will give regulators and irrigators enough time for discussions on how to make the program permanent, said Rep. Vikki Breese-Iverson, R-Prineville.

'Current information shows the pilot project is providing irrigation districts with more manageable flexibility while also ensuring other water users are protected," she said before a recent vote on the House floor, where SB 130 passed unanimously.

While irrigators don't need to formally apply for temporary transfers or pay the associated fees, OWRD watermasters review transfers, investigate complaints and regulate unauthorized uses, she said. "Districts must maintain standard water rights transfer criteria and maintain records and ensure there's no injury to other water users or expansion of irrigated acres," said Sen. Jeff Golden,

D-Ashland, during the Senate floor vote in March, where the bill passed 29-1.

Although the program has been effective for many years, "Water Resources tells us there's not enough data to assess the pilot project" because it's not used very frequently, he said.

Another challenge to making the program permanent was the unusual 2021 legislative session, during which discussions were stymied by remote hearings due to the coronavirus pandemic.

Regulators also need to figure out how to broaden the pilot program to include smaller irrigation districts that don't have professional managers to comply with record-keeping and other requirements.

Panel: Salmon solution requires trust, cooperation

By BRAD CARLSON

Agricultural interests. conservation groups, the power industry, tribes and others must work together to restore salmon runs whether or not the four Lower Snake River dams are breached, panelists said Tuesday on the first day of the Idaho Grain Producers Association's Big Dam Meeting in McCall.

IGPA called the June 1-2 meeting, primarily in response to a February proposal by Rep. Mike Simpson, R-Idaho. His Columbia Basin Initiative calls for breaching the dams. It includes a $33.5 billion fund to mitigate impacts on agriculture and transportation, energy, communities and recreation, and federally licensed Columbia Basin dams rated above a power-generation threshold. It comes with a 35-year moratorium on litigation.

Simpson and Idaho Gov. Brad Little were scheduled to speak June 2. Little's multi-stakeholder Salmon Working Group in December issued recommendations that did not include breaching.

IGPA Executive Director Stacey Satterlee said it's hard to imagine a future solution as efficient as the dams and the export shipping route they create. It starts at the Port of Lewiston, Idaho.

Paul Arrington, executive director and general counsel of the Idaho Water Users Association, said in an interview that a frustration in the salmon debate is that "everybody kind of pigeonholes you — if you support the dams, you must hate the fish, and if you support the fish, you must hate the dams and the benefits they provide. That's just not the case. All of my folks want the salmon back.' either-or debate also "focuses on the extreme and ignores really good work that has been done."

He said it remains unclear

Simpson's proposal would impact the Snake River Water Rights Agreement of 2004. In that pact, water users above the three Hells Canyon dams — which are above Lower Granite in southeast Washington, the uppermost of the four Lower Snake dams — each year provide flow-augmentation water to help downstream-migrating fish. In return, users are compensated, and a 30-year biological opinion on the Upper Snake allows water users, the state and tribes to avoid these biological opinions and the operations of the river," Arrington said. "We've been able to avoid that similar litigation on the Upper Snake" due to the agreement.

Stakeholder collaboration works when interests get what they need, not necessarily what they want, and fish aren't getting what they need, said Idaho Conservation League Executive Director Justin Hayes.

Wild Snake River Chinook Salmon smolt-to-adult return rates are low recently.

Idaho Department of Fish and Game Deputy Director Jim Fredericks said two adults must return to Lower Granite for every 100 smolts that migrate downstream. The population can grow when four adults return per 100 smolts.

Fredericks, in a report to the Salmon Working Group, pegged the return rate at Lower Granite below one for smolt migration year 2018 including adults that returned after one, two or three years in the ocean. It ranged from below one to around three from the 1990s to 2000, and from below one to four from the mid 2000s to 2010. It fluctuated from below one to around two in

Timber project that would increase grazing faces environmental lawsuit

By MATEUSZ PERKOWSKI Capital Press

A timber project that would open 10,600 acres for increased livestock grazing in Washington's Colville National Forest is facing an environmental lawsuit that seeks to overturn its approval.

The Kettle Range Conservation Group has filed a complaint alleging the U.S. Forest Service authorized the 48,000-acre Sanpoil Project in violation of the National Environmental Policy Act.

The nonprofit organization claims the agency didn't sufficiently analyze the project's impacts or alternative forest treatments, particularly due to its close proximity to other large-scale timber projects.

Within the project's boundaries, the Forest Service expects to harvest timber from 8,400 acres and conduct prescribed burns on 19,000 acres, which will make more land available for grazing.

"This activity would significantly impact forest ecosystems — transforming complex forests into clear-cut wastelands, damaging stands of old-growth trees, spreading invasive species, degrading riparian areas, compromising unique habitats, severing vital wildlife corridors, despoiling pristine wilderness and prime recreational areas and displacing sensitive, threatened and endangered species," the complaint said.

The plaintiff alleges that 11 timber harvest projects affecting 179,000 acres in the national forest have been approved in the past decade, most of which are adjacent or near the Sanpoil Project. However, the Forest

Service's environmental assessment of the project didn't adequately study the cumulative impacts of these activities on riparian areas and wildlife species, contrary to NEPA, the complaint said.

The agency failed to anaiyze a reasonable range of alternatives to the project and only compared the treatments to taking no action, the plaintiff said. "The Forest Service refused to consider viable alternatives for the project that would have minimized environmental impact and preserved valuable wilderness areas, because it was impermissibly focused on maximizing timber revenue."

Over a 10-year period, the agency expects to remove 50 million boardfeet of timber from within the project's boundaries, which is enough for up to 12,000 log trucks, the complaint said.

The project's effects on the environment are serious enough to warrant an more robust "environmental impact statement," rather than the environmental assessment conducted by the agency, according to the complaint.

The lawsuit claims the project is inconsistent with the 2019 Colville Forest Plan because it reduces "desired conditions" and diminishes the forest's "scenic quality" and "wilderness characteristics." The nonprofit organization also faults the forest plan for not complying with several federal laws.

The plaintiff has asked a federal judge to overturn the Forest Service's approval of the project and enjoin logging, prescribed burns and road construction until the agency completes an environmental impact statement.

Capital Press unable to reach a representative of the Forest Service as of press time.

In its authorization decision, the agency said the Sanpoil Project is "needed to promote forest health and resiliency" while improving water quality and providing local

The Forest Service said it considered five additional alternatives to the project but ultimately didn't study them in detail and also reviewed cumulative impacts but didn't find them to be significant.

By opening more than 10,000 acres to grazing, the project will "achieve better distribution on the landscape" of cattle, which will benefit riparian health and water quality, the agency said.
