

WASHINGTON NOTES.

Secretary Long announced that Rear Admiral S. A. Crowninshield, chief of the navigation bureau, would be detached from that position and take command of the European squadron next March, being relieved of his present duties by Rear Admiral Henry C. Taylor.

The war department, it is said, is preparing to submit to congress a mass of evidence in favor of the restoration of the canteen system. The department will insist that the abolition of the canteen has been productive of much evil. General Miles has come into great favor with the anti-canteen forces because of his recent announcement of his opposition to the restoration of the canteen.

Colonel A. L. Mills, superintendent of the military academy, in his annual report, says the cadets are loyally obeying the new regulations against hazing. The discipline of the corps of cadets, says Colonel Mills, has greatly improved during the year, and is now in an excellent state. It is believed that no military body exists which excels it in soldierly appearance and in the perfection of drill and military exercises, as well as in the higher requirements of devotion to duty.

$100 Reward, $100.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

Dr. R. H. Churchill of Pasadena, Cal., who was for years the family physician of President Garfield, was sentenced at Los Angeles to 15 days for vagrancy. Drink is responsible for his fall. He at one time practiced medicine in Cleveland, and it was in that city that he attended Mr. Garfield and his family.

D. Jarvis & Son, who for several years have operated a shipyard at Stockton, Cal., have secured a site on the Sacramento river, near Everett, Wash., and will there open a big shipyard. In addition to shipbuilding, the repair work on Puget sound is said to be very extensive, and as there is no yard there at present to do that class of work, the firm expects to do a large business in that line.

To the Public.

Allow me to say a few words in praise of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. I had a very severe cough and cold and feared I would get pneumonia, but after taking the second dose of this medicine I felt better, three bottles of it cured my cold and the pains in my chest disappeared entirely. I am most respectfully yours for health, Ralph S. Meyers, 54 Thirty-Seventh st., Wheeling, W. Va. For sale by Chas. Strang, druggist.

The commissioner and assessors at Victoria appointed to inquire into the loss of the steamer Islander, in their finding, Pilot Le Blanc for keeping the ship at full speed after seeing floating ice about ten minutes before the accident. The master, according to the finding, did not appear to realize the imminent danger in which the accident placed the ship, otherwise prompt measures would have been taken to save life. The custom in Pacific coast waters of leaving the bridge of a steamer at night in charge of only one officer is condemned.

SAVING HIS DOG

JOHN GORRIE had long determined to emigrate to New Zealand, but had remained in his native county of Fife as long as his mother was alive. When she was laid to rest in Cuthbert kirkyard, he and his dog sailed for the strong New England of the southern pole. His brothers had preceded him some years before and each had taken with him a collie from the old homestead, black and white dogs, rather small in size, but wiser than most. Since their departure, for fear of importing hydrophobia, regulations had been put in force not allowing home dogs to land in Australian colonies unless they underwent a quarantine of deadly length and rigor, which few survived.

John Gorrie, who had seen promising signs of this plaid dog family go with his brothers, rejected the warning that his "Gala" would not be allowed to land. He paid his dog's passage, stubbornly determined his slim, four-footed friend would also herd the flocks on the "virgin lawns" of Brighter Britain. Gala was a gentle-eyed, supple creature, as clever a shepherdess as ever drove the silly sheep to market. She had a sorry time of it during the passage, for the cramped space and steamboat laws ill-suited one whose limbs could carry her untrippingly. John Gorrie, standing at the bows of his good ship, a burly, hard-featured, shrewd man, wore a grim look on his stern face as he wondered how his good collie was to be landed. The very idea of killing his valuable and constant companion made the heart of this big man very sore. He treasured that meek, wistful-faced black and white dog as much as he treasured the pocketbook which contained all his worldly wealth.

He met with nothing but Job's comforters on board. The captain one day on inspection paused to say to him briefly: "I wonder a canny Scot like you was befooled into paying a collie's passage." The carpenter offered to take Gala back to England, but John replied: "I'd rather pit her down myself than give her aw." He knew Gala's heart would break if he left her. He still had a mulish stubborn belief that somehow he could land his dog. He had written to Sandy Gorrie the mail before he sailed, telling him Gala and he were coming. Sandy, he knew, would meet him at the Bluff (where the steamer first touched) and he hoped they would in them to devise some plan to evade the law and save his white-breasted Gala before he was forced to disembark at Dunedin. The thought of "pitting down," as he called killing, the fond dog which gazed on him with its loving eyes raised to his puzzled face, who tried with pathetic playfulness to coax away his sadness, cost that stoical, hard-featured man many a sorrowful day, many a wakeful night. It was a cold September spring forenoon when they arrived at the Bluff, and the new land had a grim air about it which John said truly "minded him of home." The steamer had to wait a day there.

"You must declare poor little Gala," said the purser to Gorrie. "I don't think she can even get a chance of being quarantined, for they have an extra panic on about home dogs just now."

"Aye," answered Gorrie, with the sulky brevity of his native Fife. "Good Gala—nice old lass," said the purser, stroking her intelligent, long head. "It is a pity you brought her."

"Aye," again answered Gorrie, looking down into her plaintive, beseeching eyes, for with her ready instinct she guessed mischief was brewing.

Sandy Gorrie met his brother, and as they stood talking together the New Zealand farmer praised Gala, for she was endeared to him by memories of home.

"She is real, like father's pyat." It is an awfie peety man about her, and mine's deed last night, mind you, she was high 12 years," said Sandy.

"Whaur did she dee?" said John, eagerly. "At my sister-in-law's ower there. Mag was getting that auld, Mrs. Christie she kept her when I was in the north, and last Sabbath she just lay down and dived and dee's."

"Whaur is the body?" "Buried by yon cabbage tree," said Sandy, pointing to a lone, shock-headed tree which stood as sentinel over a rocky bay, and behind it rose smoke, telling of a homestead in the hollow.

"Man," said John, earnestly, a light of hope gleaming in his deep-set eyes, "howk her up and I'll save my bonnie Gala. We dinna sail afore the night and I'll dae wi' your Magpie as the captain did wi' the sodgers. She'll be the example, no my Gala. I went to a reading at Ladybank last Martinmas it would be, and the meenister, no ours, but another, he tellt about three sodgers that were late frae camp, when the duke of Wellington was fechtin' in Spain. Weel, the duke he said they were to hang for it, but so many guid men were killed the captain he was fith to sacrifice three strong chaps, but the duke said for an example to the thersit mannae. The captain, he was a clever yun. He sent off the three men to another pairt of our army and he takes three deid men and hangs them on a tree. The morrow's morn when the general gaed by he saw three deid men and they were a fair contented, for the deid men who were of no use maie, they made as good an example as if they'd done away wi' the three live lads."

John Gorrie braked into sudden alacrity. He went ashore. Gala was tied up on deck, a troubled dog, looking with anxious eyes after his master's receding figure.

"What about the dog that has been deead?" asked the customs officer.

"I don't know," said the captain. "The Scotchman who owns her is ashore at present. I'll speak to him myself when he comes back. Nee dog, too! The lasses aft are all making such an outcry about it. The dog was a favorite with them, she was so gentle and intelligent."

"Gorrie, the owner is ashore, but he said 'he wad be pitten' her down this night, and he sent the customs and the laws of his new country to regions below," remarked the purser, imitating Gorrie very creditably. "He'll dae it, hissel, none o' your mangin', a stane and a string and happit in a bit o' his ain plaid."

That afternoon Gorrie brought from the shore a "muckle stane." He was silent and sad, sitting in the "doleful dumps," stroking Gala's shapely, sleek head. There he remained till dark, a stolid figure with his piteous-faced collie contemplating him. His brothers came out again when the saloon passengers were at dinner. Many of them bemoaned the fate of the dog that had been their fellow-passenger for six weeks, for Gala had been noted and admired by all. David, the eldest of the Gorries, wore a shepherd's checked plaid folded across his big chest, and over that an ample Highland cloak hung on in negligent manner, half to hide his arm, which, for a time, he wore in a sling. The two men talked to John and accompanied him down below, saying they would help him with Gala. Once in the cabin David Gorrie took out of his plaid a glassy-eyed, dead Magpie, and proceeded to tie up Gala's legs, while John bound a cruel mixture of gag and muzzel round her long nose. All the while she started but obediently looked up to her master with melting tenderness in her trusting eyes. Into her sage head, however, John implanted the idea all was well. He assured her, saying: "Be canny the noo, lassie—Daurie will be douce wi' ye." Into his plaid, where he had often on the Fife Lomonds in years past carried a sick lamb, David Gorrie slipped the bound Gala.

"It is a guid job she is o' the wee sort," said John; "they aye said at Cupar she was owre sma', but I'm richt pleased I keepit her and no the ither I sold to Andrew Bethune. She was unco' big."

He drew the flap of the Highland cloak over her gagged face, and the arm supposed to be in a sling kept her secure and quiet.

Gorrie saw his two brothers in the boat and watched them row off in the dark toward the shore. Who, seeing these three big, raw-boned Scotchmen, would think they were consummate actors? No one guessed John Gorrie's depression and grief as he sat in public that afternoon caressing Gala was all assumed. The sturdy giant, David Gorrie, rolled in plaid and cloak, appeared to onlookers but a simple shepherd from up country, come only to greet the "new chum" brother, having to knoop off work because of his hurt arm. Three cunning schemers, these obtuse, loutish puffins proved themselves to be. Gorrie went back to his cabin and blackened old Magpie's grizzled muzzle with a piece of coal. She was marked like all her breckin' hair for hair, the same as her younger sister, except where age had put his white sign on her. He tied a stone around her neck, gashed the old dog's throat, and for fear a closer inspection might prove Gala's dead body somewhat elderly, he enveloped it in a shroud. He carried her forward, his knife in his hand, and walked up to the captain, who was seeing if he could not clear out that night.

"I did it myself, sir," he said, touching his hat to the commander; "I could na' thole anither handlin' her and my brither thoct a stane might slip."

Gorrie bent over the stark body of the once active collie in his arms, gazing at it remorsefully, for the honest shepherd had become for the love of his dog a wily actor.

"Quite right, my man. Here, quartermaster, tell the customs officer to look here, that dog we declared is dead. I'm sorry for you, shepherd, for she was a nice beast, but, as I said, you should not have brought her. Will you have a glass of whisky?"

"Thank you kindly, sir. I've no objection to a dram, but by your leave I'll put her ower. For a' their regulations and hydrophobia talk there is no a collie in New Zealand, forbye Fife, to beat my Gala!"

He stepped to the side, lowered the rigid black and white body, and threw her overboard into a watery grave.

Soon the engines began their work, and they steamed on in the clear night to Port Chalmers, Dunedin's seaport. Gorrie was "dowie and wae"—every one supposed it was because of the dog's death, but his extra solemn looks were caused by anxiety as to her safety.

The body of a black and white collie floated ashore at the Bluff. The stone had slipped from its neck. "A warning not to bring out home dogs," said the customs officials, pointing to the swollen, distorted corpse, little guessing that among the tussock covered hills of Soutland an agile collie, of the color of a shepherd's plaid, "mobbed" the far scattered flocks, or gartvort gaily at the heels of John Gorrie's cantering steed, and this self-same collie answered to the name of Gala.—Globe-Democrat.
