

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

Boer prisoners continue to arrive at Bloemfontein from various British mobile columns in Orange River Colony at the rate of about 100 a week.

The general drift of the reports of medical officers to the British war office attributes the high mortality in the concentration camps to the dirty habits of the Boers.

A patrol of yeomanry, at Brakspruit, about 140 miles west of Pretoria, was surrounded by 300 Boers and lost six men killed and 16 wounded.

The rear guard of Colonel Bryng's column was attacked near Hellbron, Orange River Colony, by 400 Boers, said to be under the command of General De Wet.

OUR CHORE BOY.

She's up at the break of the dawn. And tumbled the hay from the mows. And a merry laugh rings, and a cheery voice sings.

Her Speckle and Brindle and Boes. And Buttercup there by the door. Their big stanchions creak, for they're trying to speak.

Oh, it's well for a lassie to mend. And it's well for a lassie to darn. But her eyes are as bright as the stars in the night.

Her Forgiveness

By Ethelyn Leslie Huston.

"NINE o'clock! We will now behold the animals parade," murmured Mrs. Stanley Weston, glancing at the little gold clock that had just announced the hour with musical self-satisfaction.

"Don't be rude, Betty. They're my guests—if they are a bore. How do I look?"

"A touch of rouge, my dear, would assist the ensemble. Pallor is supposed to be interesting and sounds well in books and things.

"A little more! That's better. Not sleeping well—hm? Don't care whether school keeps and all the rest of it? Won't do, my dear. Ruinous to the complexion. Cut it out."

"I wish you would not use that abominable slang. You talk like some factory girl." Mrs. Stanard put the silver box back on her dressing table with a weary little gesture and the blue eyes narrowed again.

"My dear, it is absolutely impossible to express one's self in the queen's English nowadays. It is good form, of course, but inadequate. Awfully inadequate. The factory girl says in a sentence what good form takes a chapter to express. And even then the factory girl has the best of it. What are you fretting about?"

Mrs. Weston elevates her artistically penciled eyebrows and thoughtfully pats the pearl clasps on her long suede gloves with one finger.

"That pose is very graceful and fetching, cherie," she says cheerfully. "But it's waded. There's no one here but me. And it's 9:15."

She looks sharply at the listless face in the mirror, then rises with a little frown of silken petticoats and gets a glass of wine from a cabinet.

"Drink, pretty creature, drink. I don't dare, for it always makes my nose red. That fact alone has saved me from the gold cure. For if there's anything I enjoy it's the wine when it is red. And I could, like Omar, divorce barren reason without a quibble. But my complexion! Especially one's nose. And now, Mrs. Stanard, if you do not want your guests to go home in a dudgeon, minus hostess and temper, it behooves you to make your presence material in the drawing-room. And I do not propose to waste this new gown on the desert air any longer. Come on."

A little later and white lace and blue velvet are surrounded by light and color, the sweeping gowns of fair women and the black coats of the men as contrast. The air is soft and languorous with the odor of hot-house flowers, and through the hum of cultured voices creep the faint strains of distant string instruments.

Mrs. Stanard's face is serene and slightly smiling, and her voice has just that touch of personal interest that soothes and attracts, as she greets each of her guests with perfect tact. Her eyes, dark and tranquil, pass from face to face and tell nothing. The hours pass and find her still smiling, interested, unwearied. Only the flowers droop at her breast and as she unfatens them she presses the thorny stems hard against the soft flesh for a moment. A sharp pain is relief from a dull ache, sometimes. And she smiles oddly as she drops the dead flowers behind her and pulls the frosty lace a little higher where one thorn has marred the skin.

"I missed you last night. You did not go to hear Calve." A tall man with a dark, strong face was bending over her. The face was too grim to be handsome. It was heavily lined and the eyes were deep-set, keen, reticent.

So each evening while Martha slept Pierre worked. He arose stealthily like a robber to write without arousing suspicion. He felt that it was his last chance to write something worth while.

Several days later Pierre and his wife went back to the city. He was loath to leave, but Martha was happy in anticipation of new triumphs. Her devoted count had promised to open new, and yet more fashionable, houses to her.

"We will push your husband," he said, in a protesting tone. "Work, Pierre," added Martha. "The indorsement of the count is valuable. Don't throw away the chance."

"What!" exclaimed his wife, curiously. "You have said nothing of it to me!" "What was the use? I have always had such bad luck with my work that I have not mentioned this one even to you."

Martha was satisfied and the thought of a play by her husband pleased her vanity. She liked to imagine herself in a box on the opening night. She kissed her husband on both cheeks.

"Are you content?" he asked, anxiously. "Yes indeed, my husband," she answered. When the time approached for the representation Martha was happy.

For the newspapers contained many advance notices and most of them spoke of the play as excellent. The play presented at the Gymnase was not a comedy, but a drama of great depth and emotional strength representing a drama of the strongest human emotions.

Martha, charmingly dressed in mauve, was in a box with a crowd of friends, among who was the persistent count. From the first words of the play she was surprised. The story acted on the stage was familiar to her. It seemed as if she had had the same experiences in the days of her courtship.

In the second act the action grew quicker. A crisis came between the man and wife. The words they spoke were those that had passed between Martha and Pierre. Evidently he had put his own experience into the play. It was interesting, but what would come next? Martha had been so indifferent to Pierre that she could not guess.

The third act was admirable. In the drama the suffering of her husband was analyzed with a master's hand, cruel in his resignation, torture and tenderness. The role of the woman was studied with a psychology delicate and mocking. It was a masterpiece.

Martha listened with beating heart. Each phrase spoken by the comedians was for her like the stab of a dagger. Was it possible that she had made Pierre suffer like that? For by this time she knew that her true history was being told on the stage.

"Bravo," shouted the count, who did not understand the real meaning of the play. "My friend, your husband, is a clever fellow, and we will make something of him."

But Martha did not answer. She stifled her emotion. "Take my arm," said the count, at the end.

"Not to-day," she answered. "I shall be proud to go on the arm of my husband."

Pierre followed her with difficulty, making a passage through the admiring crowd. When in the street his friends crowded to congratulate them. They wished to give them a supper. When the supper had ended and they reached home in that house where Pierre had experienced so much happiness and grief, Martha fell on her knees before him and broke into tears.

Thirteen Not a Hoax. "Well, Miss Bingham isn't superstitious." The remark was made during the performance of "The Climbers" by a man with a statistical turn of mind.

"Here's little old No. 13 all over the place. There are 13 letters in the names of Amelia Bingham, Frank Worthing, Madge Carr Cook, Ysobel Hawkins, Florence Lloyd and Joseph Physique, the scenic artist. You find it again in the names of some of the characters: Freddy Trotter, played by Ferdinand Gottschald; Julia Goodesby, by Clara Bloodgood, and Jessica Hunter, by Maude Monroe."

"I can explain that," remarked a bystander. "Clyde Fitch read 'The Climbers' to Miss Bingham on a Friday; contracts were signed on the following Friday, and it was first read to the company on the thirtieth of the month."

"How do you know?" testily inquired the first speaker, annoyed that anyone else should have taken away the glory of his discovery.
