guiding star, Nina Beeson, still shone in his firmament. It was far past midnight when he fell asleep and the sun was shining full in his face when he awoke the next morning. On arising he found one of his burrows gone, so he started after it down the little stream that ran on top of the ground about three miles and then sunk. He tracked his animal for two miles and there, far down the canyon he could see him. The burrow had caught the strap tied to his halter. When David stooped down to loosen it he noticed something bright. On closer examination he found it to be free milling quartz running heavy with gold. He looked around, picked up piece after piece. Then he began to look to see from where it came. Far up the mountain overhanging the canyon he saw the ledge, but it was almost impossible to reach it, but so excited was he that he left his mule and started up the canyon to a place where he could climb the mountain. Up he went, no breakfast, half dressed, but he must reach that ledge in some way, so on he goes. He does not realize that the sun is hot, he has forgotten that he had not had his breakfast. He could only see the guiding star beckoning him onward and upward. It was one o'clock when he had crawled around so that with the little prospect pick he could pick pieces after pieces of the shining quartz from its mother ledge. After he had examined all he could be cried out, "At last, at last the hope of my life is in that mountain. Millions on millions are there. I will go down and write in letters of happiness to old 'Shortie' Garnett to have me Toledo range made to order. I will buy the half of his store for her. I will even tell him my long kept secret and have him tell her all about it. Tell him to guard her from others' devouring desires, for 'Shortie' has been there and knows." "Shortie's" for all kinds of hardware and stoves. Watch this paper for story next week.
