PARKER DENOUNCES TARIFF.

PORTLAND, Or., Aug. 18.—Judge Alton B. Parker, he candidate of the Democratic party for president four years ago, opened the Democratic campaign in Oregon tonight at a large and enthusiastic meeting in the Helleg theater in this city. Judge Parker in his address confined himself to a discussion of the tariff, contending the Republican party had at all times sought to perpetuate this policy, a policy which, he declared, operated to exact from the people at large an unjust tax for the benefit of a few.

Canada Wants Laborers.

WINNIPEG, Aug. 14.—The provincial department of agriculture is flooded with requests for farm help from all over the province. There remain between 500 and 600 districts to be heard from, and it is expected that by the time all requests are in there will be between 1100 and 1200 men needed in Western Canada's harvest fields.

The Matchmaker

By MARTHA C. SANFORD. Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

Katherine opened her eyes with a start and looked over the edge of the hammock. Below her on the green velvet grass sat a two-year-old baby, wrinkling up his chubby face and letting out little gurgles of laughter.

"Oh, I know your joke, young man," she laughed back at him. "You kissed Katha, didn't you, and woke her up? Now, come here, you rogue, and I'll pay you back in your own precious coin."

Without any pretense of denial or defense, young Reginald allowed himself to be gathered up into a shapeless, dimpled mass, squeezed, shaken out and spanked. Suddenly, waiving the conventionality of announcement, a man interrupted this glorious game of retribution.

"Man say—kiss Katha," he said, pointing an accusing finger at the approaching interloper. "Why, no, Reginald," Katherine remonstrated hastily, "man didn't say anything of the kind."

"Kiss Katha—man," transposed Reginald, with conviction. At this Katherine sat up straight and forbidding. "Mr. Kingley," she began, and her tone was very chiding.

"I wouldn't have believed it of you, Jack," she said disconsolately. "Believed what, Katherine?" "That you'd do what the baby said!" "Kiss you," he asked bluntly.

"Take such an advantage of me—kiss me when I was asleep," differentiated Katherine indignantly. "Katherine looked at him searchingly. "But Reginald said—"

"I realize," interrupted Jack, with good natured sarcasm, "that compared with whatever that two-year-old prodigy may say any words of mine—"

"Just the same," broke in Katherine, "it wouldn't be the first time that Katherine looked at him searchingly. "But Reginald said—"

"I realize," interrupted Jack, with good natured sarcasm, "that compared with whatever that two-year-old prodigy may say any words of mine—"

"Just the same," broke in Katherine, "it wouldn't be the first time that Katherine looked at him searchingly. "But Reginald said—"

Don't Hire Your Feed Ground

Jack watched her perplexedly. She looked very appealing in her graceful slenderness. He could think of only one thing to do—and he did it. Katherine was on her feet in an instant, her cheeks red and stained and flushed with indignation.

"So it was you the first time after all, Jack Kingley!" she exclaimed. "I think you're too contemptible for words. You're a thief and a—and you don't tell the truth, and—"

"Not so fast, not so fast," begged Jack gently. "I really wasn't the first one, Katherine, upon my honor, but—"

"Well, what in Cupid's name are you two quarreling about?" called Bill Heming from the rear background. "Can't an unmarried man—pardon me, I should have said an ineligible man—find one undisturbed spot in this hymeneal garden? Just passed two other lovers down the path who seemed to be a bit out of tune. It must be the weather."

"I assure you the weather has nothing to do with it, Mr. Heming," answered Katherine haughtily. "She's right, Bill," assented Jack genially. "The cause of our seeming disagreement is purely—"

"Imaginary," interrupted Katherine, with such manifest alarm that both men laughed heartily. "But in spite of this little diversion the conversation dragged along apathetically, and Bill at length gave up his attempts to mend the situation."

"Well," he said, yawning ostentatiously, "guess I'll go in and play with the infant. He's nearer my level than you self absorbed grownups. By the way, Miss Katherine, how did you like our little joke?"

"Katherine looked at him with a questioning expression. "Reginald's and mine, of course. We watched you asleep for a while; then we thought it would be great fun to wake you up. So we kissed you."

"Mr. Heming!" gasped Katherine. "You don't mean to say that you—"

"Bless you, no, my dear. I just helped Reginald."

"But what—what did you run away for?" Katherine pursued inquiringly. "Oh, that's a little habit of mine, Miss Katherine," was Heming's cavalier reply, as, musing, he walked toward the house.
