ing of public grazing lands were adopted by the executive committee of the American Livestock association today and reported to the convention. The resolutions favor the passage by congress of the Burkett bill, with some amendments, and were stoutly contested by delegates representing the Colorado Horse & Cattle Growers' association, which oppose the leasing system proposed by the federal administration.

COMMUNICATIONS.
 Grants Pass, Or., Jan. 20.
 Editor Tribune:
 In your issue of the 18th inst. is an interview with State Engineer Lewis that is a repetition of a goodly lot of nonsense that has been published so extensively over this state, that I wish you would find space for this explanation. Mr. Lewis says:
 "If an irrigation company was formed to divert the surplus waters of the upper Rogue river on to the fertile valley near Medford, it would doubtless be confronted with threatened litigation by the power interests at Gold Ray. If this company has any rights they should be definitely recorded and protected by the state. If they have not a right to the entire flow of Rogue river the public is entitled to know the fact."
 Why not? When people have expended half a million dollars in a power plant what kind of idiots would they be to let some other people take the water out of the stream to their injury and loss? Even Mr. Lewis would not do that. No man can be honestly deceived to do so, and such criticism is unreasonable and unwarranted. If the public or any one desires to know the rights of the company owning the power plant they can easily ascertain the same by learning the amount of water that can be utilized in the power plant.
 Mr. Lewis proceeds to cover himself with glory in this wise:
 "It can perhaps be asked with propriety at this point why it is necessary for representation of this company to appear at each session of the legislature to oppose the enactment of beneficial water legislation. Perhaps their right is not vested to all the water of this stream, and they do not desire any legislation which will make it possible for the public to ascertain this fact. Under our present laws, this company practically owns Rogue river."
 You are right, Mr. Lewis, and your statement can be answered with propriety and should have been answered long ago. The question was that a few beneficiaries should be showing some sense and ingenuity in opposing the rigation bill that would have been the greatest imposition on the people of Oregon that was ever enacted, and by securing the endorsements of a few good men were about to force it through the legislature. The bill contained unconstitutional provisions that even a layman should be ashamed to urge. The first one was a declaration declaring all unappropriated water to be public. The gentlemen who were urging the measure imagined by such provision that the right of riparian owners on streams where they might be living as land owners for 50 years could be thus abolished. In vain we strived to convince them that the right of a riparian owner was a property right and might be very valuable for power, and that under the constitution could be taken from the owner for a public purpose only and for a just compensation. The gentlemen were deaf to all entreaties. "Take the whole bill or none of it," was their slogan. We were told to wait till Mr. King, now of the supreme court, came down and be annihilated. Mr. King came and the first information he gave them was that such a provision was unconstitutional and should be stricken out, and out it went. This was all that the power company at Gold Ray had asked, and about all any other similar company had requested. There were other provisions of the bill that were indeed onerous. It provided for a bureaucratic administration of water rights. For instance, if a dispute arose between different claimants it was brought first to a water bailiff. From the bailiff's decision an appeal could be taken to the water commissioner, and from his decision the appeal must be taken to the state engineer, whose office is at Salem. From there it would go to the circuit court of the county where the ditch was situated. A young man might live long enough to get it to the supreme court. This practice would have made the state engineer the head of an important bureau, which would have called for assistants and legal advisers and clerks numerous, but it would be quite expensive. What reason there was in failing to provide for a direct appeal from the bailiff to the court no sane man can determine.

 Another provision of the original bill required the attorney general to commence suits in the name of the state to determine the rights of claimants of water on all the streams in the state. On Rogue river and tributaries there are over 500 users of water. If this bill had passed they would all have been brought into court and required to litigate against each other, although there was no trouble between them. I could not comprehend the reason for this provision until a wise gentleman who was supporting the measure I had in hand. He told me that he and associates had 100,000 acres of land in Eastern Oregon under contract that if this act passed the attorney general would be required to litigate water rights, and with a decree in court showing the amount of water appropriated and the amount available could file a suit and go east and buy the land and clean up a lot of money.

 I believe Oregon needs a real water law and in irrigation districts should be administrative, but still up a bureau with a chief at Salem and to pass upon all disputes before the courts could hear them, or require the attorney general to have people into court to settle water rights, whether any one wanted to litigate or not, and to benefit promoters, or try to supersede the constitution legislative enactment, was a ridiculous effort to supply the existing need even if supplied by owners of power plants. If an irrigation law is not made the office of state engineer could be abolished. It is now chiefly immaterial. The collection of data abundant and irrigation is hardly necessary for its continuance.
