

JWEER FOSSILS FOUND IN HILLS

Some Strange Animals of Ancient America Discovered in Black Hills

WASHINGTON, July 22.—The Black Hills region and the adjacent country have been noted finding places for the bones of strange animals of ancient times. Throughout this region, ages ago, in the Cretaceous period, there were swamps and bodies of open water, intersected by a network of water courses that were constantly changing their beds.

The interesting spaces, which were slightly above the water level, were covered with an abundant vegetation, through this region roamed many beasts whose bones were here and there added in the mud that, now become a rock, preserved to the geologist bones are treasured in many museums.

Among these were the Ceratopsia, an order of reptilian creatures which are the subject of a technical description volume just published by the United States geological survey.

The Ceratopsia comprised many genera and species, but the most striking perhaps was the genus called Triceratops, a three-horned animal of huge size represented in the United States National museum at Washington by a skeleton nearly as big as that of an elephant. An immense bony frill covers the upper part of the neck, and horns like those of an ox, a deer and a goat, give the head of a Triceratops a queer and striking appearance.

The Ceratopsia found their food in the vegetation of the swampy region inhabited, and the agencies by which they became extinct are not very known.

Not Surprising
The rapidly increasing demand for

has sorely taxed the capacity of the model bottling plant at the spring. This has necessitated frequent enlargements and the employment of a larger force. While the business has been doubling each succeeding year, the same critical attention is given the bottling as ever. There is a reason for this ever-increasing popularity. If you have ever drunk this perfect table water, you know why.
