DRUMMER HAS TALE OF WOE

Comes In From Roseburg and Unburdens Himself Regarding the Situation There.

A weary, bedraggled drummer with a chastened expression was assisted off the southbound passenger train this morning by a porter with a complexion like the leg of a grand piano. Instead of jauntily throwing his grips into the languid hands of a hotel runner, and then asking where the mayor took lunch, the drummer staggered with his grips to the shelter of the eaves of the depot, and then teetered back and forth on his feet as one about to take flight to the giddy heights of the realms of the whicless whence.

"Smatter?" asked an alert news sleuth.

The drummer winced, as though he expected a blow or a telegram from the house asking what he did with that last $100 expense, and then he showed a disposition to grab the Jacksonville "express" which was trying to sneak out of town with its tail between its legs.

The local, however, divined his intention, and, laying its ears against its neck, beat him to it.

Then the drummer replied, with a shudder: "Roseburg!"

"What ails Roseburg?" was demanded.

Clutching the reporter by the coat lapel in an ancient Mariner, and demanding if he was "a friend," the drummer delivered his sorrows thus: "The '5 that town, why, man, it's uncanny. There's a Sabbath quiet pervades the place that makes it look like the graveyard just after the breaths have been hung on the headstone of Willie's birth. Why they don't get up there until 9 a. m., and in a barber shop I saw a sign 'Walk in!' then just beside it was another, 'Open at 11:30.'

"The business men open sessions for acquiring a bunch of chewing gum with prayer; the autos won't spark after four miles an hour; the women with red hair wear yellow veils; the hotel clerks hop bells and help the Chinese cook with the dinner order; the road engines don't whistle within a mile of town; the switchmen don't swear; the cigars won't burn; there's moss growing on the steps of the jail; the newspaper reports from the last semi-weekly edition of the Oregonian.

"Oh, 's awful," and the drummer wept a moment while the news sleuth held his head.

"An' then," he continued, "I a't a man I thought was a hostler to carry my grips back to the station, an' I nearly got 30 days. He was the justice of the peace. The only thing alive there are the roses. They are a growin' on the graves of a bunch of a bunch of white-whiskered old wrecks laid away like faded lives in lavender. W'y," and here he gave way to emotion and spirits frumented again. "I ordered ham and, and the waiter gave me back 10 cents change. I ran for the depot for fear I might lose my mind and buy the town with the other dollar I had.

"Roseburg is the peace-fullest town south of heaven," and the drummer was assisted to a seat where he could ponder upon the monumental folly of trying to peddle "goods" to a corpse. He looked like a bright drummer, too.

Road Should Be Natural.
"The roadway should appear as the easiest and most natural approach to the point to be arrived at and showing as little evidence as possible of grading and embankments, its graceful curves should result from the necessity of avoiding some irregularity of ground, water or trees, and over its entire length it should afford varied and interesting views for those who traverse it.

"From what I have stated it would appear that if the best possible result is desired to be obtained for the making of this Center Lake road, the work of the scenic engineer should precede that of the construction engineer, and that after the selection of the route, they should collaborate in the details of construction."
