HOW TO USE THE NATIONAL FORESTS

Forest Supervisor M. L. Erickson has issued the following brief synopsis of national forest laws and regulations for the use of the public:

The Crater national forest includes the lands withdrawn by executive order for national forest purposes, which are situated in the Rogue River, Applegate River and Upper Klamath Lake watersheds.

Claims.

As affecting the title to claims already established within the boundaries of the national forest, the land office, department of the interior, has entire jurisdiction. The secretary of the interior, however, requests the co-operation of the forest service by having its forest officers, who are on the ground, examine and report on claims that happen to be within the boundaries of national forests.

No forest officer nor the forest service makes any recommendation either for or against the issuance of patent to a claim. Their duty is simply to report the facts resulting from the examination, and the general land office decides the status of all lands.

Full information about the land laws, if not already well known, can be secured by writing to the local land office.

Homesteads, Act June 11, 1906.

Homesteads under the forest homestead act of June 11, 1906, can be taken up in national forests where the land desired is more valuable for agricultural than for any other purpose. The classification of the land under this act is wholly within the jurisdiction of the secretary of agriculture. Squatting on forest land is prohibited and settlements except under special use permit cannot be made until land has been listed and a filing secured.

Mining.

Mining, prospecting and the location of mineral in national forests is not interfered with. Mining laws already existing apply in national forests the same as on the public domain and a valid discovery is always recognized. One of these laws is that a mining claim must be used for purposes consistent with its character and tending toward its development.

The establishment and conduct of stores, hotels, etc., on unperfected claims cannot be interpreted to mean development of the claim, and special permits for such business establishments must be secured from the forest service. Another of these laws is that the timber needed in the development of a mining claim cannot be cut only from the claim in question or from the group of claims contiguous to the one where the material is to be used. Timber cut from another party's unperfected claim or group of claims, whether with the claimant's consent or not, constitutes trespass. The necessary timber for mining or development of a mine not available on the same claim or group of claims, may be secured from national forest land by applying to a forest office.

Fires.

The essential duty of the forest service is to protect the forest from fire. Since the penalty for leaving a camp fire unextinguished or allowing a fire to spread is punishable by both imprisonment and a heavy fine, both by the state and by the government, it is to the interest of everyone to use care with camp fires and to co-operate and assist forest officers in reporting and checking forest fires.

Game.

The federal government has no jurisdiction over the protection of game inside or outside national forests. The game laws are entirely state matters and the enforcement of the law rests with the state game warden. Forest rangers, however, are often appointed by the state game warden as deputy game wardens.

Grazing.

Except for the stock used by campers and travelers and a total of ten head of milch cows or work horses, permits are required for the grazing of cattle, horses, sheep, goats and hogs on the forest.

Special Uses.

Proper use of the national forest by the people, such as transient camping, hunting, fishing, prospecting for mineral, surveying for lawful projects, are unrestricted, and no permits are required.

Permits are necessary, however, on national forests for all other kinds of occupancy or uses whether begun before or after the national forest was established, except upon (1) patented land; (2) upon valid claims for uses consistent with the development of such claims; (3) upon rights of way amounting to easements.

Hotels, stores, stage stations, barns, fences, roads, residences, summer resorts, hunters, trappers, miners' and stockmen's cabins, telephone and telegraph lines, railroad, tramways, transmission lines, conduits, reservoirs, ditches, wharfs, etc. are all upon which require permits and upon which the forester may, when commercial or valuable, make reasonable charge for their enjoyment.

Timber.

The timber necessary for the use of campers, travelers and surveyors may be cut without permit. Settlers, prospectors or similar small consumers may obtain free use permits to $20 stumpage value from forest rangers and supervisors. The timber so obtained under free use permit must be used for domestic purposes, and not for any business or for sale.
