The rainstorm which prevailed in this vicinity Monday afternoon was very mild in comparison to the violent down-pour to which the country near Talent and Phoenix was subjected. It is reported that during the continuance of the storm, water flooded the roads to the depth of three inches.

In a recent issue of the Oregon Scout, a correspondent to that sheet attempts to palm off the following brainless howl for intelligent sarcasm:

"The little soldier boys of Oregon are to have an outing at Hood river next month at the expense of the taxpayers of the state. Verily the taxpayer groaneth under his burden, but the state legislature heedeth him not, but squandereth his hard earnings on decorated dudes known as the O. N. G."

(Too bad he is too poor an excuse for a men to don a uniform.)

The late rains have developed the presence of an affection of fruit on the trees that causes much uneasiness among orchardists in this locality. The affection resembles the scale, but inspector J. R. Casey infored an ADVERTISER representative that, upon close examination, it is found to be a kind of fungus, and, at the present development of the crop, will not prove detrimental to the fruit later on. The difference between the scale and this fungus is that the former has an elevated center, while the center of the latter is depressed.
