"That is wonderful," said the little one. "It is blue from above, a little bit red in the sun, and when we look at it from this side of the room we see nothing!"

"Think about it a little. The glass is as broad as my finger is long. But it is at least three times as high as my finger. When you look at it from the side, you see only a finger's length of water; but when you look down into it, you see through three fingers' length of water—three times as much. You see it blue from the side, and three times as blue from above, don't you?"

"Is that really true?" said the little one, as she measured with her finger.

Search Lights versus Torpedo Boats. It is stated that one of the most effective means of protecting a ship in these days of torpedoes (the grouping to-gether of a number of stationary search lights, each illuminating its own section so that the ship is surrounded by an unbroken circle of light), is to be adopted in the new American warships. This has been suggested by a very pronounced defect in the usual search light practice. In order to afford sufficient time for a

An Electrical Suurise A Twenty-third street theater has brought out an electrical sunrise. A curved screen, part of which is made of gauze, so that the light may shine through, extends around the stage, and behind it is an elaborate system of incandescent lamps. The controlling ap-paratus is so grainated that fifty differ-ent degrees of light and shade can be produced, thus causing the sunrise to grow imperceptibly. Another use of the electric current made at the same place is in representing the explosion of
