

SLEEP, SOLDIER, SLEEP.

(This touching Memorial day hymn was written by Capt. Jack Crawford, the poet-soldier. Capt. Crawford is known in Salem quite well, having spent several days in Oregon a few years ago when recovering from injuries sustained in the memorable Lake Labish wreck.)

Sleep, soldier, sleep, thy warfare is o'er.
Wee'd dread alarms shall wake thee no more.
Sleep, calmly sleep, 'neath the flowery sod.
Waiting the revolve of God's wheel.

Over thy resting place bright flowers we twine,
Gratitude's emblems on loyalty's shrine.
Fruits of thy valor we gratefully reap,
Union and Liberty, sleep, sleep, sleep.

CHORUS
Beautiful flowers of spring
Lovely banners hither bring.
Sacred thy memory ever we'll keep,
Under the grassy sod.
Waiting the call from God,
Sweetly and peacefully sleep, sleep, sleep.

Captain Charles King.

APTAIN KING had been appointed a member of the board of visitors to West Point the year I graduated. I remember that the corps took more interest in him than in any other member of the board that year, not excepting General Lee Wallace, the author of "Ben Hur."

One evening, while sitting out a dance in the reception room during one of the large hops, I overheard a conversation between a Vassar girl and a first class man about Captain King's latest novel.

"It's dashing, exciting, absorbing, and a capital story; but if it is the true color a man must hold life rather cheaply to follow the life of an officer. Don't you think he over-draws?"

"Oh, he's our own army writer. There's no velvet and down cushion about it. He's been on the war trail himself, and he tells it the way he saw it. It's most all hard roads and hungry riding."

"The young fellow gave his honest opinion, and it is worth something, because it is a sample of the opinions of the class, yet at the time he spoke he knew as little of the army from real experience as any man in the corps."

"He must have arrived at West Point that time late in the evening for we saw him for the first time at reveille—6 o'clock in the morning. He came out of the angle of the barracks with one of the tactical officers and stood at the railing of the porch of the barracks while we were sleeping falling in and answering the roll call."

He was a small man, which rather surprised us, for the perusal of his writings would lead you to look for something of a giant. Though not taller than five feet, his figure was as gracefully trimmed, very elegant and dignified and graceful even to courtliness. He wore gold-rimmed glasses, a stylish gray sack suit, patent leather shoes, and a straw hat with a brim having considerably less acreage than one sees nowadays. Altogether he was what you call a dresy man, neat, but not gaudy.

Afternoons we saw him in a blue diagonal frock coat, with the Royal Legion button in the lapel; a pair of trousers in which you could detect a few drops of blue, very elegant and dignified and graceful even to courtliness. He wore gold-rimmed glasses, a stylish gray sack suit, patent leather shoes, and a straw hat with a brim having considerably less acreage than one sees nowadays. Altogether he was what you call a dresy man, neat, but not gaudy.

Captain King had kept up his military walk better than most old graduates. Even the unlearned "dicks" who met him on the walks stood attention and saluted, knowing him to be some officer in civilian garb. Many an ambitious drummer-major, who makes a business of his gait, is sighing today because he cannot attain that step that Captain King cannot get rid of.

Yet his manner and facial keenness are even more soldierly than his walk. His eyes, clear, blue, and piercing; his nose, straight, regular, and gracefully molded; his blonde mustache, carefully trimmed, twisted at the ends, and faintly turned upward; an even, firm mouth and small chin; a head full and massive above the ears, prominent behind and held well back; a high forehead in which the lines of thought and study have not assumed a surly curvature; all combine to make him an agreeable person to look at. He is elegant, graceful, charming, but not pretentious.

That morning at reveille he seemed to be as lively as a boy who has just reached home for the summer vacation. He asked many questions of the tactical officer, and once leaned far out over the railing to look at the adjutant, thinking no doubt of the days when he stood in the same spot in '61.

We were thinking about that, too. One winter's day in '66 a cadet was accused of stealing certain moneys from the cadets in barracks. After some crude detective work, in which an cadet adjutant, Charles King had been prominent, Cadet Oremus Boyd was settled upon as the guilty person and sentenced to be drummed out of the corps. With the winter wind blowing the dead leaves and snow around the dreary area of barracks, in such fierce gusts as to almost drown the sound of the drums playing "The Rogue's March." Cadet Boyd was marched up and down the length of the battalion with the placard "Thief" on his back and then driven from the reservation, leaving behind no comrade's heart warmer to him than the wind of that December day.

A subsequent official investigation failed to attach any guilt to Cadet Boyd, so authorities permitted him to return, but the corps believed him guilty. The "thief" placard, for it is considered scandalous for a cadet to associate with a thief or a liar. Until graduation, and for many years after, until his many qualities and brave heart had overcome outside prejudices, the ostracism of his classmates made his life a living hell.

Then the truth came out. An officer on his dying bed confessed that he knew the thief to be Cadet Casey, who had been accidentally killed by a soldier at drill while some months from his apparently honorable graduation. Casey had contracted a clandestine marriage which if known would have caused his dismissal and blasted his hopes in the army. He had stolen the money to send to his wife, and had caused circumstances to point to Cadet Boyd as the thief. This he had confessed to his classmate in a moment of delirium while lying in the cadet hospital during the following winter. The classmate, who was his friend, had done a greater wrong, and kept the secret in his bosom to his dying day.

The classmates of Cadet Boyd could not do enough to relieve the burden of their regret for the great injustice done him. Captain King had been most zealous in punishing him as an offender. He was even more zealous in his efforts to exonerate the man he had wronged. In 1886 Captain Oremus Boyd, Eighth cavalry, died in the field from an illness contracted in the line of duty. It was then that fresh laurels were twined in memory of his patience and bravery under the shadow of a cruel wrong.

A pamphlet containing the facts was distributed among the members of the corps, cautioning them against the evils of "snap judgment." There was no name signed to it, but we know the authorship to lie between Captain King and Colonel Richard H. Savage, of the class of '68. Which of them it was we never knew; but we remembered the words and the cruel wrong which had brought them forth—and that morning when we saw him we took a long look at the adjutant of '86.

During that ten days with the board of visitors he seemed to be trying to live a few days of cadet life over again. He was everywhere, looking at everything, the most enthusiastic member of the board. He slept in barracks, dressed in mess hall, did everything but march with us in ranks, and of course made friends of us forever.

One evening he met a few of the graduating class in the dialectic hall, and he had a bit of good advice to give. "By all means keep a diary," said he. "I kept one almost the entire time I spent on the plains, and it has been worth $20,000 to me. Without it my books could never have been written. And above all things never enter your commanding officer's office without being sent for, and don't forget to give your superiors the first salute."

"What started you up in literature, captain?" asked someone. "Circumstances, chiefly. I wasn't long in finding out that keeping a family on retired captain's pay is a beggar's business. I had to go to work, so I took to writing." Then he told us about his little family and advised some of us to write up to the hotel to see them.

"What was your first book, captain?" "The Colonel's Daughter." I wanted to call it "Winning His Spurs," but he gathered the idea that I knew that would not do, so we made a change and put that in for the subsidiary title.

"We all think that your best book, even if it was the first." "Do you? I'm sorry, think I have done much better ever since. But that's all a matter of taste anyhow. I can never write another first book."

Then he asked if any of us were going into his favorite arm, the cavalry. There was one vacancy that year, and as I had decided to take it, I said "Yes."

Then he told me a little of his old regiment, the Fifth cavalry, with which he had served as adjutant to General Merritt, and went on to speak a few words eulogistic of the general. He wished to know if I did not think him a model soldier.

Now General Merritt had just the year before closed his term of office as superintendent of the Military academy. He was a firm disciplinarian, and had been sent to break up my practice of having. He broke it up, but in doing so he did a good deal of promiscuous breaking in other directions. He broke up bad practices, he broke cadet officers who wouldn't obey orders, he broke into a few old worn-out cademic ruts, and he brought up customs that were not good for young soldiers. His stern, unbending, stalwart justice had stirred up a feeling of soreness in the hearts of the corps that was painful to see. Without coming in to break up the fall of administration is the one that the shade of General Sherman is singing about in heaven today. But at the time we graduated it was worth several figures for a man to say he approved of General Merritt.

When Captain King put his question, although I remembered some extra tours I had walked equipped as a sentinel, I stammered out something which sounded like approval. My heart was probably more loyal to the general than my words were. That was the beginning of my acquaintance with Captain King. He had sympathies in common. He said a man who could smile over six hours of extra duty had the seed of a soldier in him. We shook hands and he promised to keep an eye on my progress in the army. I told him he had better buy a microscope, but I could see at the time that the name of his old chief was about as near to his heart as anything outside of the corps.

We watched him living his old life over again as the days passed and graduation drew near, and somehow got to feel well acquainted with him, so that we were not afraid to step up and speak when we met him on the walks.

Captain King rarely spoke of himself, but one day, in answer to a question about his first service, he said he had entered the army as a drummer boy at the first outbreak of the civil war, and for gallant and meritorious drumming in the present sent him the next year to West Point. We knew, however, that Rufus King had been the name of his father, and his grandfather and his great-grandfather before him, and that each of them had distinguished himself in the army and foreign diplomatic service. We knew, moreover, that Captain King had been retired from active service for wounds received in the line of duty.

One evening Captain King was talking to a group of us at the north sally-port. "Boys," said he, "you don't know how much you love this old academy. It's a hard, stern, alma mater. When the band plays 'Home, Sweet Home,' at your last parade, and you feel yourselves spending your last night in army, you may have a bit of a lump to your throat, but you'll soon get over it. You'll even go away talking about shaking the West Point dust from your feet. But when you come back after a score of years, with a few gray hairs and perhaps a scar or two, then you will look on these spreading elms, and that green level plain, and those sheltering mountain tops like dear old friends, and you'll come back to them as you do to your mother, and you'll want to sleep in barracks again and turn out at reveille, as I did a week ago." (This narration of reminiscence was written by the late Lieut. Alvin H. Sydenham, who was well known in Salem, where he was stationed for several months a couple of years ago, being in charge of the recruiting station of the U. S. A. located here at that time.)

ELMIRA, OREGON. Do You Know Where It Is? MRS. W. T. KAYSER, Lives There and tells in the Following Letter of the Wonderful Benefit Received from using Dr. Grant's Medicines.

NEAR DEATH'S DOOR FROM Inflammation of the Kidneys. Dear Sirs: I can scarcely realize I was so near death's door, the result of a bad attack of inflammation of the kidneys. My urine was bloody and terrible pains ran the spine. I tried several remedies, but got no relief. When I was suffering terribly a copy of your Medical Adviser was received by some one in our household. After reading part of it I sent for a bottle of Dr. Grant's Kidney and Liver Cure, and after five doses I felt relieved. I continued taking until I had taken three bottles, and was completely cured.

Drop Dead. Every minute, and it is due to your medicine that I feel this well; and I am willing that all who are afflicted should know of the wonderful results from using your medicines. Respectfully, MRS. W. T. KAYSER.

ELMIRA, OREGON, April 6th, 1894. DR. PAUL GRANT, President of W. R. McGe Co., Portland, Oregon. Sir:—I wish to express my heartfelt thanks to you for the great benefit I have derived from using your medicines. I have been a constant sufferer for ULCERS BROKE OUT. Cured by Using Dr. Grant's Sarsaparilla. Dear Sirs: I wish to thank Dr. Grant for the wonderful cure effected upon me by using his Sarsaparilla and Grape Root. Last summer I was taken sick with what the doctors called la grippe, I did not seem to get any better. My liver was in a horrible condition, as I was constantly throwing up bile. My legs commenced to swell and in a short time ulcers broke out all over them and I suffered terribly. A traveling man whom I knew advised me to try Dr. Grant's Sarsaparilla and Grape Root. I was completely cured, scars all healed up and I felt like a new man. I highly recommend Dr. Grant's Sarsaparilla and Grape Root to all afflicted. Yours truly, REUBEN WARNER, Colfax, Wash.
