A sage confidentially predicts that in a very few years the vexed question of the propriety of wearing bloomers in treading the bicycle will soon be amicably settled by the advance of science. Tricycles will be in almost universal use on the streets, he thinks, and they will be propelled by storage batteries of electricity. Man, and the new woman, if you please, will sit lovingly together, on the seats of these carriages and the man—or the woman if she chooses—will guide the machine in the easiest manner imaginable by simply moving a handle attached to the guiding wheel in front.

Funeral of W. T. Peet.

On Thursday W. T. Peet, of Corvallis, was buried. On last Tuesday he died from the effects of drinking an ounce of aconite, mistaking it for black berry brandy. Mr. W. H. Graham, the druggist, who drank with him, is out of danger.

W. P. Conway, who was at the funeral, says the attendance was very large, delegations of Masons and Knights Templars making a large and imposing procession. Mr. Peet seemed to be still alive, so natural was his expression of countenance when viewed at the funeral.
