SPRING DRESSES IN PARIS

Two Materials Are Still Used to Make One Frock—Embroidery Is Much Used for Trimming.

At a place where about one hundred and fifty frocks were shown every one was marked by that hallmark of French taste in clothes—simplicity, observes a Paris correspondent. Tailor-made, little dresses, dinner gowns, were all simple; exaggerations were not to be found. Black silk jersey was much used for tailor-mades, with long waistscoats of embroidered linen, the neatest of these being a white one finely embroidered in jet beads. Skirts are short and slim, coats are either redingote or short, the three-quarter coat being nowhere. There are pockets and buttons, but the pockets do not bulge; they lie flat and have buttoned back flaps.

Collars are no longer important for size, but there are some well-cut shawl collars on the coats, some of which run off into a waistbelt and button behind. Beige, sand color, gray, navy blue and black are the colors for tailored suits; some show practically no trimming except in the waistcoat, or in pockets and buttons. Basques show a slight fullness on the hips, and skirts look even narrower than they are, as they often have a deep hidden plait.

Little dresses of all kinds are shown this season, from the most simple of country frocks in linen to the most elaborate town dress in taffetas, crepe de chine, silk crepons and mousseline de soie. Two materials are still used to make one frock, and embroidery is much used for trimming. A favorite embroidery is gray Angora mixed with white or blue, and there are some Little dresses in black crepe de chine with dawn and gray embroideries of impressions. The sleeveless pinafore tunic with wide shoulders and loose sash belt is general. Sashes, loose belts and girdles are common. Short sleeves are as general as long ones, especially for the young.

NEWSPAPER IN OLDEN TIMES

"Telephone message for you, sir."
"What is it?"
"Lot says that he doesn't want anything printed about his wife turning to salt. He says that it is a family affair, and doesn't in any way concern the public."

NOT AFRAID OF OUTLOOK

"So you're actually going to marry young Spender! Why, there's nothing to him but his follies and a big bank account."
"Well, you can rely on me to change all that."
