Dangerous Airplane Work.

You must remember that with a perfect camera in a perfect light it is possible to take a snapshot in a five-hundredth part of a second. As a matter of fact, machines that are out photographing do not travel at 120 miles an hour, or anything like it. They have to jog along at 60 miles an hour, and trust to the scouts to keep off hostile airplanes; this is why this type of air-work is so nerve-racking—the machine is the slowest in the sky, a mark for all the hostile machines and anti-aircraft guns, yet it has to jog along on the course set out for it and take no notice of anything until the job is done.
