THE APE

THE ape is a vest-pocket edition I of man which is brought to this country and exhibited in a cage for the purposes of comparison with the real article. After a full-bearded man with a face which is a cross between a spitz dog and a chrysanthemum has leaned over the ralling at the zoo for a little while and studied the countenance of the naturalized ape, he will break for the nearest barber shop on the dead run.

The ape has long, eager toes and a prehensile tail, with which he is able to swing pro and con with a preoccupied look. He also has a coarse speaking voice, with which he argues violently with anybody who tries to pass him a sour peanut. The commercial ape is the kind which earns a living for some exhausted Italian who emits hymn tunes from a hand organ. There is also the cultivated trick ape, which smokes a cigarette with much the same facial expression as his brethren in pants.

The mandrill is an ornamental form of ape which is as highly colored as a Fourth of July poster. When the mandrill opens his mouth to say something he is half undressed. The gorilla is the nearest approach to the male sex which science has yet dug out in Africa. He walks on two feet with the dignified air of a blase floor walker. The late Mr. Darwin discovered the ancestors of some of his wife's relatives, it is said, by studying the gorilla at close range.

Vest-Pocket Edition of Man Exhibited in a Cage for the Purposes of Comparison With the Real Article.

The chimpanzee is a blood relative of the ape, but comes in a larger package. The chimpanzee is a haughty and reserved animal, and has very little affection for anything except his meals. It is not safe to toy with a chimpanzee unless the toyee is looking for a pleasing form of suicide. (Copyright.)
