A Story With a Purpose

"I have had Sacc-Ozone analyzed," said Cole. "One of the university professors demonstrated that the chief curative properties of Sacc-Ozone were opium, alcohol, water and sugar. There is a little cocaine thrown in to give it its attractive color."

Brand was horrified. "Impossible!" he exclaimed. "See for yourself," laughed the editor. He picked up a sheet of paper from his desk and handed it to Brand. It was the sworn statement of Professor Henry Wilson, noted as a chemist and medical scientist, that Sacc-Ozone was exactly what Cole had declared it to be.

"Why don't you go on with your great work?" asked Brand. "I notice you have stopped your attack."

Cole's explanation gave Brand as much surprise as did the revelation concerning the contents of the so called medicine. He got right down to business. He went over the last financial statement of the Clarion and immediately made out a check for $45,000.

"I'll see you through!" he declared enthusiastically. "There's plenty more where that came from."

"Good," exclaimed Cole, rising and extending his hand. "I'll take you at your word."

Brand sat down at a desk and began to write.

The war against the deadly, cruelly deceptive patent medicine was on. The licensed slayer of deluded fathers, mothers and babies was facing vital battle for its existence.

In the meantime matters were going from bad to worse in the plant of the Boyd corporation. So many of the men were becoming ill because of the unhealthy conditions that they began to protest. The drinking water was unfiltered and came through leaky old pipes. The wash sinks had been used for many years and were rusted and dirty. The rooms were dark, and there were no ventilators.

Old man Doyle, one of the leading bottle inspectors, had his hours lengthened because times were hard. He protested. At noon hour he gathered his fellow laborers around him and complained to them that he should get more pay for the extra time that, in addition, his wife was desperately ill of consumption and he was needed at home to help take care of the children. Instead of being allowed to finish work and go home he had, under the new rule, to remain at the factory until 7:30 without additional wages. He had to report for duty at 7:30 in the morning or lose his job.

Duncan received news of old Doyle's talk to the workers. In a burst of fury he rushed down into the bottling department. He forced his way through the crowd of sympathetic employees and confronted Doyle.

"You crook," he cried angrily, "you are trying to start a strike!"

The old laborer, worn in mind and body from his years of life in the gloom and the germ laden air of the Boyd factory, gazed steadily at his master for a moment and then dropped his head.

"No," he answered in low tones. "I'm not trying to start any strike. Ask the men"—he waved his arm at the crowd that had gathered around him. "I only told them I ain't making enough money to take care of my sick wife, anyway, and in addition to that"

Doyle's Wife Began to Cough Again. The politicians need you. Go and join the Socialist party.

Doyle's face whitened at the direful words. He thought of the additional weight of poverty that now confronted his wife and three little children.

Duncan sneered at him mercilessly. "You see, Doyle," he said sarcastically—"you see I am a man of my word." The other workmen moved menacingly on Duncan. They murmured angrily among themselves, but their boss was firm.

THE RECALL

The chief topic of conversation all over the county the past week has been the movement that has been started with a view to recalling the members of the county court. Reports from those having the circulation of the petitions in charge are to the effect that the work of securing signers is progressing satisfactorily to them. On the other hand, it has been reported that some of the circulators have been attacked with chilblains and have returned the petitions to the source from whence they were received, or Teal.—Dallas Itemizer.

The Men Surrounding Duncan Menacingly.

you've made me work two hours more a day, even though I've been employed here for eighteen years."

Duncan glared venomously at Doyle. "What do I care about your personal troubles?" he snarled. "You're here to work, not to make trouble among the men. You keep your mouth shut and look after those bottles or I'll throw you out of here on your neck. Get busy, all of you." he ordered the crowd of workers.

As Duncan, puffing vigorously on a big black cigar, turned to return to his office Doyle spoke.
