BUFFALO BILL'S GREAT SHOW

The Buffalo Bill Wild West show attracted a large crowd, possibly due to Col. Cody's popularity but not to any special feature of the performance. The lariat throwing was only what could be seen by any man on a stock farm. The riding was far below the average. No outlaw horses were in the ring. It was very tame all the way through. Many of the spectators left before the show was over.

COMMITTS SUICIDE IN WATER TANK

A stranger about 8 o'clock Wednesday morning was acting peculiarly in the railroad yards in Ashland, saying to two other travelers, "There," pointing to a small stream of water, "is my son drowning." A little later the man was seen with his clothes all off except his undershirt wading in a little stream of water at the oil tank and was ordered to get out of there. In a short time he was seen running up to the water tank and throw himself in. The tank was full and it was some time before he could be taken out, and when recovered was breathing, but life soon became extinct. There was practically nothing to identify him with except on the collar of his coat words were written in what looked like either R. Jonas, R. Johns, or R. Jones.

In his pocket was found an "Underscored Edition of the Gospel of St. John" with the stamp of the "Apostolic Faith Camping, Mt. Tabor, Portland, Ore.," thereon, and also a blank memorandum book from a Seattle firm. His hands showed him to be a laboring man and he was five feet eight inches tall, weighing about 140 pounds dark hair sprinkled with gray brown mustache and about a weeks growth of beard. Undertaker Stock is embalming the body with the view of holding it to await identification. He was evidently penniless.

OPP MINE WILL RESUME SOON

GRAMMAR LESSON NO. 1

SYNTAX OF ADJECTIVES

There has been no correct answers received for the first lesson up to the time of going to press. We will correct the sentences in this issue.

"Iron is more useful than all the metals." "A fondness for show is, of all other follies the most vain." When the comparative degree is employed with "than," the latter term of comparison should never include the former, nor the former the latter; as "Iron is more useful than all the metals," "All the metals are less useful than iron." In each case it should be, "All the other metals."

When the superlative degree is employed, the latter term of comparison which is introduced by "of," should never exclude the former; as, "A fondness for show is, of all other follies, the most vain." Here the word "other" should be expunged, for the latter term must include the former; that is, the fondness for show must be one of the follies of which it is the vainest.

When equality is denied, or inequality affirmed, neither term of comparison should ever include the other, because everything must needs be equal to itself, and it is absurd to suggest that a part surpasses the whole; as, "No writings whatever abound so much with the bold and animated as the sacred books." "No other writing whatever," because the sacred books are writings.

"Of all the other simpletons he was the greatest." This sentence is correct. It was the intention of the writer to omit the word "other," but for some reason the proof reader unintentionally corrected this sentence.
