Water is Life

"As blood is the life of all vegetation. Population will multiply, but land that produces food can never increase in area. * * * The tillable lands of the Willamette, Umpqua and Rogue river valleys now produce, without irrigation, but a third of the crops which the soil is capable of yielding, if provided with the necessary moisture during the best growing and maturing portion of the year. * * * The necessary amount of water is contained in the subsoil within easy reach; the cost of applying it is a small percentage of the value of the crop; by its use the bulk is doubled and trebled, and the size and quality largely increased. Utilization of water, underlying every acre, will soon treble present population and establish small farms in place of large ones."—From "Well Irrigation" a booklet published for free distribution by S. P. Co. For free copy write Mr. Wm. Mc Murray, Portland Oregon.
