I GOT EVEN WITH BOTH

By T. ANTHONY TWining
Copyright, 1910, by American Press Association.

My uncle, George Chatsworth, was a very eccentric man. As he grew older his eccentricity exhibited itself in violent prejudices. He disliked everything that was in his time and advocated anything that was not. He was very rich and had no children. I was his only living relative and his heir expectant. My position was rather trying. I must agree with him in all his odd ideas or run the risk of offending him and thereby losing a fortune.

The most deep seated prejudice of my uncle was against the medical profession. When ill he would not have a doctor near him. In this I felt it my duty to interfere, and on one occasion, taking the matter into my own hands, I sent for a physician. My uncle ordered him out of the house and was so wroth with me that I feared he would change his will, cutting me off entirely.

He changed his will, but did not cut me off. He put in a codicil that if when he again at any time fell ill I should call in a doctor his property should all go to an old friend of his who had as many violent prejudices as he had himself. This old fellow, Peter Newman, always took the opposite side of every question from that taken by my uncle and had no fear in forcing his opinions. The strange case of these two curmudgeons being warm friends and clinging to each other in a cyclone. I was told of this provision of my uncle's will, but Mr. Newman was not. Since my uncle abused the doctors his friend defended them. I think my uncle did not dare tell Newman that he had disinherited me in case I did what he would approve.

Well, my uncle was taken down with a malady which was sure to kill him if he did not have medical attendance, and he would probably die anyway. I confess I was not anxious that he should live, but his injunction that I should not call in a doctor placed me in a very delicate position. No one but I knew of the conditions of his will, and if it became known I would be berated by friends, neighbors and relatives for permitting the old man to die rather than oppose him by calling in medical attendance. But it was I who was to be rich or remain in poverty and not they. I omitted to call a doctor, nor did I give the real reason for not doing so—that I would lose an inheritance if I did.

As soon as it was known that my uncle was dangerously ill people began to wonder that I did not call in a doctor. Then they began to ask me the reason. When I told them my uncle would not have a doctor they all agreed that it was my duty to force one upon him. From that they passed to insinuating that I wished him to die that I might get his money. Finally threats were made that if I didn't "do my duty" word would be sent to the police that I was slowly murdering my uncle in order to possess myself of his millions. The strain became so great that I think it possible I might have yielded if his fortune would have gone to any one else than old Newman, whom I hated.

Finally Newman himself, having heard of his friend's illness, came around to see him. Uncle was too ill for his friend to attempt to force a doctor upon him, but Newman had no sooner left the sickroom than he loosened his tongue upon me, bringing forth imprecations upon me for permitting my uncle to die for the sake of coming into my inheritance.

"Can't you wait a few years, you young villain, for a fortune that will surely be yours? One would suppose that if only for the sake of appearances you would give him the medical attendance he needs. He will probably die of this illness anyway, and you'll get the money. Then why not do your duty?"

"I will not take the responsibility," I said, "of disobeying my uncle's wishes."

"Then I will take steps to make you disobey his wishes, since it is evidently your desire to let him die for a purpose. I shall at once make this matter known to the authorities. I shall bring a charge against you of willfully—"

He was moving away when I stopped him. "Hold!" I said. "You are my uncle's best friend, aren't you?"

"I am."

"Well, will you take the responsibility of calling in a doctor?"

"I will."

"Then sit down and write out an order for any doctor you wish to call and I will take it myself."

"I'm not afraid of the old man," he said, his face red and blue with indignation, and, sitting down at my desk, he wrote the order. I carried it myself and after showing it to the doctor put it in my pocket.

My uncle died, and a few days after the will was opened I met Mr. Newman on the street. He knew of the codicil and how he had unwillingly prevented the possibility of his inheriting his friend's money. He gave me a grim look and passed me without any other recognition.

My uncle had not stopped to think that in forcing me to keep the doctors away from him he was conferring a benefit upon me. He was a very estimable man, but I was not sorry to part with him, and was much pleased to get even with his counterpart.
