

A METHODOICAL GIRL.

By MARY P. WILLARD

Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

Miss Virginia Stubbs was a very practical young woman. When she was barely fourteen she laid out a course for herself and pursued it to the letter. She proposed to marry by the time she was twenty and to have her own farm. From the time she was seven she had eschewed candy, dolls and toys, putting the money she might have expended for such trifles in an old woolen stocking. When she was sixteen she heard her father say that a farm in the neighborhood was to be sold under foreclosure of mortgage and if he had but $300 he would buy it. Virginia told him she had $150, which she would like to buy a farm with, so he scraped together the balance and bought the farm for $1,500, making the first payment. Within two years Virginia had paid her father the money he had advanced, and she owned the farm.

Virginia's plans, of course, included a husband, and the man she wished to fill that position was Cyrus Barker. Cyrus didn't have a farm or money, but he suited Virginia, and she set her cap for him. Cyrus was rather indifferent at first, but Virginia always continued to make him feel at home, and that's what most young men wish for when they go to other people's houses. Then one evening when they were sitting side by side looking over some pictures their cheeks, being very close together, somehow touched. Cy's arm was resting on the back of the sofa on which they sat, and he let it drop on Virginia's waist. Virginia didn't make any objection to this, and their cheeks remaining contiguous, Cy turned and kissed her.

Virginia, who had planned all this, felt sure that it was the beginning of a courtship that would end in marriage. She was nineteen and a half years old, and having planned to be married and go to live on her farm by the time she was twenty, she had six months in which to snare the man for whom she had laid her trap. She was making a little money here and there, with which she was reducing the mortgage on her farm, so that no great sum of interest would stand in the way of her marriage.

While Cyrus Barker continued his calls and his caresses—the latter only when especially tempted—he got no further in his courtship. A month passed, then another and another, with no progress toward matrimony. Virginia did not worry. She had made up her mind to be married on or before her twentieth birthday, and she never for a moment doubted that the ceremony would be performed.

One afternoon Cy called to take Virginia out to drive in a borrowed wagon. To his astonishment she sent word asking to be excused. She was busy sewing and would be thus employed for some time to come. This was the first time she had ever refused to see him, if even for a few minutes. There was something jarring in the matter. Like other men, he was controlled by habit, and his habit was to see Virginia whenever he liked. A whole afternoon was spoiled. He drove the horse back to the barn, unharnessed and didn't know what to do with himself. He sauntered in at the store to buy a cigar.

"Reckon yer goin' to be married," said the proprietor as Cy lit his cigar.

"What makes you think that?"

"Waal, the gal y' been keepin' company with war in here today to buy her wedding outfit."

Cy took his cigar out of his mouth and looked at the man aghast. So this was the explanation of the sewing.

"What did she buy?" he asked.

"Waal, she bought twenty yards of white satin."

"Twenty yards! Does it take as much as that to make a dress?"

"Reckon it do when they have a train to it."

"What else did she buy?"

"Oh, a bit o' lace for the bridal veil, I reckon."

Cy put his cigar back into his mouth, gave a few quick puffs, threw it away and hurried out of the store. Making a bee line for Virginia's home, he sent up word that he must see her immediately, if only for a minute. Virginia came down. Cy endeavored to discern an emotion of some sort in her face, but her features were expressionless. He began to upbraid her for what he called throwing him over for some one else. She asked him to explain. He said that he had loved her a long while and had been waiting only to make some money to enable him to ask her to be his wife. To this she replied that they were rapidly growing old and people who waited to get rich to be married were like many others who waited for the corn to ripen before harvesting the wheat. They usually died unmarried and childless. She would rather marry him than any one else, but—

That was as far as she went—as far as she intended to go. Cy did the rest. He begged her to throw over the other fellow and marry him. She then told him that there was no other fellow and explained that, having considered him an honorable man, she had concluded that he would certainly ask her to marry him. Presuming thus upon his honor, she had begun preparations for the wedding.

They were married on Virginia's twentieth birthday.

Kept His Head.

An ambassador of the great Charlemagne while visiting a court in the east, ignorant of a law of the king that condemned to death any one who moved a dish at table before the tyrant was served, committed this offense. "Great king," said the ambassador, "I die without a murmur; but, in the name of the great emperor whose servant I am, I beg of your majesty one favor before I die." The request was granted. "Give me the eyes of every man who saw me commit the crime." "It is well," said the king. "Their eyes shall be plucked out for thee." But no one admitted he had seen the ambassador move the dish, not even the king. "Then why should I die, great king?" asked the ambassador. "The deed cannot be proved against me." The king was pensive and forthwith pardoned the ambassador.

Might Is Right.

"Effie," said the timid highland lover, "I wad kiss ye, but I'm feart ye wadna let me."

She blushed as red as the sunset, but did not answer.

"Effie," he repeated timidly, a little later, "I said I wad kiss ye, but I'm feart ye wadna let me."

At the third repetition she asked: "Dae ye min', David, yesterday I couldna lift a bag of potatoes into the cart an' ye lifted them for me?"

"Oh, aye," he replied.

"Weel, that shows, David," she murmured, "that ye're far stronger than me!"—London Answers.

On the Right Road.

"Our daughter puts on too many airs," observed Mr. Spillkins.

"She does, does she?" sneered Mrs. S.

"What's the trouble?"

"She seems to be too aristocratic and haughty."

"What do you want her to be?"

"I'd rather have her to be a good cook."

"And did you ever know anybody as haughty as a cook?"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

His Usual Preference.

"What kind of meat have you this mornin', Larry?" asked the board of trade operator.

"Well, sir," said the butcher, "I've got some fine bear steak and some beef that's just bully."

"If you'll give me some lamb!"—Chicago Tribune.

Unnecessary.

"Does your course of home reading include the profane authors?"

"No, I don't need 'em. I belong to a golf club."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

It Was His Mistake.

Mr. Newed (the week before his birthday)—Good gracious, here are six boxes of cheap cigars my wife has evidently bought me for a present! I couldn't possibly smoke such vile things, and still I wouldn't like to hurt her feelings by refusing. I'll just substitute six boxes of my best Havanas and throw these cheap ones away before she returns.

Mrs. Newed (the day after)—Oh, Tom, I bought six boxes of cheap cigars yesterday for my dear Uncle Jonas, the sea captain, who lives in Wales. I have just posted them to him. They only cost me 5 shillings a box, but I'm sure he won't be able to tell them from good ones. Why, how funny you look, dear! Are you ill?

—London Tit-Bits.

Quite the Other Way.

"Does your wife go to services to see what other women wear?"

"No," replied Mr. Cumrox. "We are now sufficiently prosperous for her to go in order to let other women see what she wears."—Washington Star.
