Senator Bourne's Yardstick
 Senator Bourne, of Oregon, is to be congratulated on the spirit of the statement given out by him as the President of the National Progressive League. The trust monopolies that business is retarded, confused, and injured by the uncertainty that prevails as to the applications of existing law to the operations of business combinations. He sees that the courts are having no end of trouble in arranging the terms on which the law shall be applied in specific cases, and that the prospect of getting at any general principle that shall be clear enough to be followed readily and shall be just and practicable is poor. And he looks with distrust on the results of the action of the courts, set in motion as they must be in great degree by the will of the President and the initiative of the Attorney-General. In the situation as it is, there is far too much doubt on the one hand and far too much official discretion on the other for the best interests of business, which means for the interests of the whole vast population of the land.
 The remedy, he believes is in right legislation that is to say, in the amendment of the anti-trust law. He suggests that such amendment can and should be attained through the patient and candid hearing of the representatives of all classes of interests from the trust magnates to the working men and consumers. Possibly the situation is not so bad or at least so hopeless as he intimates, since there is now going on a process of readjustment and winnowing through the operation of the courts that has some good results and may have better. But in any case it is well that a prominent leader in the progressive movement should recognize the need of an adequate hearing on all sides and of action only on the discussion of what such hearing may bring forth. The temper of many of those active in the in that movement has been too much like that of the Queen in "Alice in Wonderland," whose prompt verdict on any one who differed from her was "Off with his head!"—Ex.

WRITES ON RIVERMILL DAM
 Corvallis, Ore., Dec. 1—The reinforced concrete dam 30 miles east of Portland on the Clackamas River, the largest hydro-electric dam in the north west, is the subject of an interesting article in "The Student Engineer" published by the engineering students of the Oregon Agricultural College, for this month. Douglas Chapin, a sophomore from New York City is the author, and has illustrated the article with an excellent photographic view and a cross-section drawing showing the construction of buttresses. Another photograph is used as cover illustration.
 Other articles in this issue are those on "A portable Assay Outfit For Field Work", a paper read by S. K. Bradford before the American Institute of Mining Engineers; "Steam Engine Lubrication", by R. D. Tomlinson; "The Knight Gasoline Engine", and the "History of Southern Oregon Mining" of C. L. Mangum.
