

Perpetual Youth

A Case In Which It Would Not Work Well

By F. A. MITCHEL

"I see by the newspapers," said Reinhard, "that these institute fellows who have been substituting knee joints in the legs of human beings and otherwise repairing the human body claim that they are on the way to cut out substances which lead to decay or bring on old age and when they succeed we shall always be able to remain young."

"H'm!" grunted Von Buest contemptuously.

"You seem to doubt the possibility of such a result?"

"Doubt it? It has been done long ago."

"Been done long ago? What do you mean, professor?"

Professor Von Buest took his pipe out of his mouth—he was always smoking—and, looking the other in the eye, said:

"Reinhard, the conceit of this age is intolerable. Most of our discoveries are accidental, though I will admit that nowadays our scientists are drawing out nature's secrets by scientific experiment. Why shouldn't what has been accidentally discovered today have been accidentally discovered before?"

"Because such discoveries electrify the world, and we all know of them."

"Some of them do now that knowledge is so widely diffused. But you who are German know that there still remain in the fatherland those who investigate for the love of science and, despising the world, do not always give out their discoveries, and when they do it is because they will benefit mankind."

"What do you mean by saying that the elixir of life has been discovered?"

"I did not say that. Listen to me and I will impart a secret. Pasteur did not begin our present methods of microbiological investigation. Jenner began it a century ago. Why should the idea lay dormant from the time of Jenner's suggestion till Pasteur took it up and developed it? It did not lie dormant. Many scientists thought about it, and some made experiments based on the idea of vaccination which Jenner propounded."

"It is needless to tell you how I became a scientist. You know all about it. I was born a scientist. When I was a little boy I was wondering what held the clouds in position, why objects were reflected in soap bubbles, why animals walked. When I was six years old I killed my pet kitten to see its works, which I supposed to be similar to those of a clock. That may seem shocking to you, but it was the beginning of investigations which led me to prolong life."

"At eighteen I left the university. I had found the professors a stupid lot, hounding down what they considered knowledge from one generation to another. Some of it was knowledge, but the most of it was error. The first president of this republic, Washington, was killed by just such men, who, following an ancient theory of letting blood in case of fever, bled the Father of His Country to death. I came into my estate soon after leaving the university, a landed property in Pomerania on the Baltic sea. There, rid of the false knowledge that flooded the world, I established my laboratory."

"I followed up the killing of my kitten by an onslaught upon such inferior animals as would give me the secrets of nature. I worked twenty years, at the end of which time I discovered an antitoxin for the decay that accompanies age."

"Why, professor?" interrupted Reinhard. "You are seventy and you look seventy. If you discovered this antitoxin, why did you not arrest the effects of age in yourself?"

"Not so fast, my friend. At the time I made the discovery I was forty years old. I could not bring back my youth, and the beginning of disease is the time to arrest it. There is another reason. I did not hunt for my antitoxin because I wished to live forever, since I knew this would bring me intolerable misery. I experimented to satisfy my thirst for knowledge. And now I can explain to you why the world never got my secret. I did not wish to cause my fellow men to suffer. At my present age I have lived too long. Had I the physical strength of youth the mortal ennui of age would be with me. And what would this ennui be with me in other seventy or three seventy years?"

"In the society region in which I lived I had one congenial friend—Weisbard. His tastes were not my tastes or I should have hated him. In his world I found something different, something to refresh me. To him alone I confided my secret. I had cause to regret my confidence. He had a daughter fifteen years old, a lovely, beautiful girl. 'Could you keep her as she is today,' he said to me, 'the rest of my life would be supremely happy.'"

"I sighed, for I knew that a desire to preserve his daughter's youth would murder him and he would pursue me till I consented to give her perpetual youth. I paid no attention to this first broad hint, but it came again and again and finally took the form of a definite request."

"For a year I resisted, assuring Weisbard that if I consented the day would come when his daughter, Wilhelmine, would long for age, if not for death. Her associates would grow old while she would remain young. She would have experience which is incompatible with youth. She would belong neither to her own generation nor the one next below her. Having no proper position, being identified with no particular age, she would be a worse enemy to herself than the microbe that produces the decay of old age. All in vain. The opportunity to preserve his daughter's youth and beauty was too tempting for him. He gave me no peace till I consented.

"When I began to give Wilhelmine the antitoxin she was sixteen years old. Hers was my first case and my only one in practicing upon a human being after having satisfied myself of the efficacy of my remedy, and naturally my efforts were not at once successful. I did not completely arrest Wilhelmine's natural decay till she was midway between seventeen and eighteen."

"Von Buest paused and resumed his pipe."

"Well, professor," said Reinhard impatiently, "go on."

"In what way? In the case of Wilhelmine Weisbard there are many stories. What would you prefer to know about her?"

Reinhard thought a few minutes, then asked his friend to tell him if the girl gained or lost by remaining young and why.

"What you ask to know," replied the professor, "has in itself many branches. I will confine myself to one—Wilhelmine's relations to her husband. She married Max Menzel. He was then twenty, he thirty. He grew old; his wife remained young. Her father one day came to me with a cloud upon his brow and told me that his son-in-law, who was getting gray and otherwise showing signs of age, was making his wife miserable by his jealous behavior. She was still young and beautiful and attracted younger men than himself."

"From time to time Weisbard came to me to tell me that matters between his son-in-law and daughter were going from bad to worse. At last he confessed that he regretted having urged me to give the latter perpetual youth."

"I have given her perpetual youth," I replied, "only so long as it may be desired."

"His face lighted with pleasure. 'Can you re-establish the ordinary process of growing old?' he asked."

"There is nothing to re-establish. Let your daughter stop taking the antitoxin and the natural decay will be resumed."

"I did not see Weisbard for a week, at the end of which time he looked more lugubrious than ever. I asked him what troubled him. He told me that he had proposed to his daughter to cease taking my antitoxin and she had flatly refused. Weisbard had very unwisely told his son-in-law that his wife could resume the process of following him to old age if she chose, and he had urged her to do so. She was obstinate, and a quarrel had ensued between the two that bid fair to wreck their happiness forever—that is, all that was left of it."

"And here, my friend, comes an instance of the unity of nature. A unity that is best for us always, though there are numerous instances in which we believe her decrees are misfortunes. There was every reason why Frau Menzel should grow old. And yet those old fellows like Ponce de Leon were continually seeking for the elixir of life. A man may be satisfied to grow old, a woman never. This one having perpetual youth would never give it up, though it threw her out of harmony with the rest of the universe."

"At first it seemed that remaining young with her children would be a boon to her. It did not turn out so. A melancholy phase of life is that we cannot be of the next generation beneath us. Even a young body will not bridge that gulf."

"Every year after this the husband grew older, while the wife remained young and beautiful, and every year the gulf between them grew wider. After awhile it became a case of December and May. The older Frau Menzel grew in years the more pleased she was with the attention of young men. They, while pleased with her beauty, found in her an experience which did not accord with their own experience. This led to a continued disappointment in her that soured her disposition. The couple'sickerings were on Weisbard, who reproached himself for being the cause of their troubles."

"And yet there was one thing that would have undone, partly at least, all the mischief. All that was needed was for Wilhelmine to stop taking the antitoxin."

"That could scarcely be expected," remarked Reinhard. "How did the matter end?"

"When Frau Menzel was fifty years old she reached that age a year ago—she was a very singular compound, having a youthful body and an old mind. One evening, having forced her husband, who was now sixty, to take her to a ball, she insisted on dancing the turkey trot, which was just appearing in fashionable society. When the pair reached home there was a violent quarrel, the result of which was never seen out together again. Soon after this the husband died, and the wife discovered that the antitoxin ceased to affect her. Her youth and beauty suddenly collapsed. In a night she had grown old and ugly."

"What was the matter with the antitoxin?" asked Reinhard.

"I was making it for her and after her quarrel with her husband over the dance I consented to put in the proper ingredients."

Fulminate of Mercury.

A peculiarity of fulminate of mercury is that it produces a shock to which all other substances are sensitive, and its supreme value as an explosive rests in this fact and in the known liability of all explosives to be detonated by more or less distant explosions. There is a current of sympathetic influence in these terrible chemical compositions that is as strange as it is dangerous. What is required to produce explosion is the rapid generation of great heat along with large quantities of oxygen. In gunpowder, for instance, the nitrate of potash (saltpeter), which is the chief ingredient, is practically imprisoned oxygen, and when it is decomposed along with charcoal an immense heat is developed, which causes the gases to expand suddenly, hence explosion.

Mournful.

Emma sent her plate back three times to be filled with turkey, and she was helped bountifully each time. Finally she was observed to look regretfully at the unfinished portion of her dinner.

"What's the trouble, Emma?" asked Uncle John. "You look mournful."

"That's just the trouble," said Emma. "I am more'n full," and then she wondered why all the others laughed.

—Youth's Companion.

The Return.

"I believe," said the cheery philosopher, "that for every single thing you give away two come back to you."

"That's my experience," said Phamley. "Last June I gave away my daughter, and she and her husband came back to us in August."
