Country School Conditions Bad.

Portland, Ore., Nov. 28.—"I found the country schools in Jackson, Douglas and Josephine counties in very bad condition, in some instances indescribably filthy," reports Mrs. Katherine Kelly, visiting nurse for the state board of health who has been spending some time in the three counties, investigating sanitary conditions in the schools.

"Teachers are negligent and refuse to take the responsibility for keeping the schools up. The supervisors provided for by the last legislature should help out more and keep the schools clean," she stated to Dr. Calvin S. White, state health officer, under whose direction the inspection trips are made.

Mrs. Kelly reports that the cleanest and best kept school and also the most fairly school were both in Josephine county. The first is taught by an eighteen-year-old lady teacher from Portland.

Many cases of contagious skin diseases were found and will be treated by the county health officers to whom the cases have been reported. "Scabies" is a common skin disease reported. In cases where there are several in the condition seems to be general, it is reported.

$95,630 for Salem Schools

Taxpayers of school district 21 will be asked for $95,630 at the annual meeting in the high school next Friday evening. This sum represents a 10 cent levy of 13 mills. Last year the taxpayers authorized a levy of 10 mills which gave the treasury of the district $113,000, including other receipts. E. C. Stetman.

A Fish Story

But a True One

By LAURA C. BURNHAM

Edward Cotton was the youngest son of the Earl of Edgerton. Between the years of fourteen and eighteen as a member of a noble family he had his full enjoyment of life. He was a tall boy, strikingly handsome and a great favorite. During this period a love affair sprang up between him and Laura, daughter of Sir David Hinchelwood, an impetuous baronet as proud as he was poor. Sir David's main object in life was to marry his daughter to a man who would be able to lift the family to its condition of former years. Edward Cotton, being a younger son in a family all of whose property was entailed on the oldest male heir, must of necessity, as soon as he had grown to manhood, shift for himself.

There was absolutely no hope of his possessing the girl he loved. When he was twenty years old he bade her farewell, being about to sail for Australia. He looked the matter squarely in the face, but the girl with feminine faith would not admit that something would happen to turn their present condition.

"That's the loveliest thing about a girl," said the lover; "she's an optimist in the very face of calamity."

Cotton went to Australia more to break away from associations that would thereafter be impossible for him than the hope of making a fortune. He had not inherited business instincts and had no taste for a business life. He found a position in the counting room of a wool merchant named Oldershaw, but did not retain it long. Building himself a hut beside the ocean, he contented himself with a small remittance sent him quarterly by his father. He was naturally fond of fishing and supplied his table with fish caught in the ocean.

Cotton went to Australia in 1808. One day while out for large fish he caught a shark on his line. There was something in the fish that he needed—possibly a little oil for his lamp. At any rate, he cut it up. A number of articles undigested were in the stomach, among them a folded newspaper, which, though soaked, left the inner sheets in tolerable condition. Quite likely it had been thrown from some ship the shark was following for food and picked up by the voracious fish. Cotton took it to his hut and spread it out before a fire to dry. In the evening after his supper he took up what there was of it to read, and the first heading that met his eyes was, "France Declares War on Germany."

There were two important facts concerning this first news in Australia of the breaking out of the Franco-Prussian war. First, there was then no cable connecting the island with the mainland; secondly, the shark is a very swift swimmer. Cotton had not heard of the breaking out of the war and did not believe such news had reached Australia. He sat thinking about the matter in his cabin, and it occurred to him from his knowledge of the wool business that a European war would advance the price of wool. Early the next morning he went into the city, saw Oldershaw and told him that an important event had occurred that would affect the price of wool. Oldershaw agreed that if Cotton would tell him what it was he (Oldershaw) would give him half the profit on any wool he bought or sold on account of it. Cotton then produced his newspaper.

Wool was selling at 18 cents a pound, and Oldershaw bought all there was at hand. He had scarcely completed his purchases before a ship came in with the news of the declaration of war between France and Germany. The wool that Oldershaw had bought in haste he sold in shillings. He made a fortune for himself and one for Cotton. The war was of short duration, and fortunately the wool was sold near the highest point. Cotton received his profits within a few months after he had caught the shark that had brought him his luck and a few days later sailed for England.

He found his love still disengaged, but resisting her father's efforts to induce her to marry the son of a rich brewer. There had been no news received in England of Cotton having suddenly made a fortune, and when he appeared no one dreamed that he was a very wealthy man. He refrained from telling of his wealth, fearing that his explanation as to how he had acquired it would not be believed.

Laura Hinchelwood was delighted with his return, though she had no idea that it meant any change in their relationship. When Cotton told his fish story she thought that something had happened to turn his brain, but when he showed her his bank account as evidence she was staggered. At last he induced her to believe that he was really rich and had made his money by this streak of sheer luck.

Having convinced her, he was not afraid of any one else. Sir David Hinchelwood when he was assured of the truth, having found the fortune he was looking for, was nothing loath to give his daughter to the young man. Edward Cotton purchased an estate near that of his oldest brother, who had by this time inherited the family title, and he is now the financial mainstay of the earl and Sir David Hinchelwood.

The Rothschilds of London made a large fortune by receiving news in advance of the eventful battle of Waterloo.

Reading Advertisements

It is not alone the people who are interested in trade who read advertisements. Few people nowadays buy either newspapers or magazines who do not read these cleverly worded and well illustrated bids for business. If you should ask the average person just why he or she is in the habit of looking over the advertisements, the chances are that you would get no direct and satisfactory answer; but the real fact is, that subconsciously the public has come to regard what appears in the advertising columns as interesting reading matter.

There has been a purposful development in the spirit of advertisement writing that in a considerable measure accounts for all this. Time was when the sum and substance of the advertising ran to the effect that there was something for sale, and that it was the best and the cheapest of its kind ever offered. Practically the same or similar assertion is yet the motif of successful advertising, but it is embellished by that which interests even those who are not looking for bargains. The advertisement story of the day, whether told in display or solid column, presents to us the latest fashions, current prices, business modes that are worth studying and understanding, to say nothing about the remarkable artistry of the printer's craft, and the cleverness and originality of design on the part of the advertisement writer.

It is frequently the fact that we glean sound and useful information from the advertisement; that we learn something of the detail of business conduct rarely told in any other form. Above all there is faith in the honesty of the advertisement that formerly was altogether wanting. The advertisement bids fairly for its share of attention, and what is more, it gets that for which it bids.—Telegram

Ton of Lead to Kill

Marshal Saxe once said that to kill a soldier took his weight in lead. In spite of the perfection of modern weapons war has changed very little in some ways.

A German specialist, General Rohms, has figured on the statistics of the battle of Kin Teou, which preceded the siege of Port Arthur in the Russo Japanese War.

The Russians had 17,500 men, of whom only 400 were engaged; the Japanese numbered 35,000. The Russian loss was 100 officers and 1375 men, the Japanese lost 133 officers and 4071 men.

The Russians fired 736,000 rounds of rifle ammunition and 1778 of artillery; the Japanese figures were 4,000,000 and 40,150.

Assuming that artillery caused 18 per cent of the losses and rifle fire 82 per cent, it took 151 shells or 3330 bullets to put a Russian out of action, while a Japanese fell for every 10 1/2 shells or 214 bullets. Counting the weight of the Japanese projectiles, it took 22 1/2 pounds of artillery ammunition to disable a Russian, or 70 pounds of rifle bullets.

The famous Marshal was not far wrong, after all. The changes in art of war have made no change in men. And it is on the men themselves that depends the degree of punishment they can stand.

If the men are brave they will submit to considerable losses; if they are cowards or are badly trained or led they will retire after sustaining slight losses.—Ex.

Die in Rescue at Sea

San Francisco, Nov. 2.—The steamer President of the Pacific Coast line was said to sink this afternoon, it was reported here today, having sustained serious damage buffeting the storm in which three seamen and a passenger were lost fifty miles off Coos Bay, Ore.

Clarence Leacham the dead steerage passenger, was washed overboard by a heavy sea. Three members of the crew J. Shane, fourth officer; O. Junack, quartermaster, and H. Hansen, seaman, went to his rescue and were drowned when their small boat was overwhelmed by the waves.

A Faint Hearted Poet. Samuel Rogers, the English poet, whose home in London was noted as a literary center, was very fond of the society of ladies and was a great favorite with them. Yet he never married, and in his latter years he used to regret not having done so. Rogers' "nearest approximation to the nuptial tie" was with a girl whom he thought to be the most beautiful he had ever seen. At the end of the London season she said to him at a ball, "I go tomorrow to Worthing." He did not go with her. Some months afterward, being at Ramelath, he saw that the attention of every one was drawn toward a large party that had just entered in the center of which was a lady leaning on the arm of her husband. Stepping forward to see this wonderful beauty, he found it was his love. She merely said, "You never came to Worthing."

No Deception. Wife—You deceived me. When you married me you said you had a job on the road. Hub—Well, so I have; only it's a long time in arriving.—Baltimore American.

A Freethinker. Willie—Paw, what is a freethinker? Paw—An unmarried man, my son. Maw—You go to bed, Willie.—Cincinnati Enquirer.
