Where the Road is Water.

Writing of a tour of Holland, Arnold Bennett in the Century says:

"After a few weeks I began to perceive that Schiedam and similar places though thriving, were not the whole of Holland and perhaps not the most representative of Holland. As the yacht worked northward Holland seemed to grow more Dutch until in the chain of shallow inlets and channels that hold Friesland in a sort of permanent lap then we came to what was for me the ideal or celestial Holland—everything done by water, even grass cut under water, and black and white cows milked in the midst of ponds and windmills over the eternal flatness used exclusively to shift inconvenient water from one level to another. The road is water in Friesland, and all the world is on the road. If your approach to a town is made perilous by a succession of barges that will obstinately keep the middle of the channel you know that it is market day in that town and the farmers are rolling home in agreeable inebriation."

Locating a Broken Wire.

When a telegraph wire is broken or damaged, says several hundred miles away, how does the operator, sitting in his office, know exactly where the accident occurred?

The explanation is simple. It requires, as every one knows, considerable force to send electricity through a wire. The longer the wire the greater, of course, must be the force required. This force is measured in units called by electricians "ohms." Let us suppose that a wire between a New York office and a point 150 miles away has broken somewhere. The telegrapher knows that when the wire was intact there were required, say, 2,100 ohms to facilitate the current, or four teen ohms to the mile. He now finds that he can send a current with only 700 ohms. Dividing 700 by 14, he finds that the break in the wire is fifty miles from his end.—New York Tribune.

Contrasts in Mexico.

Perhaps nowhere else in the world is there a country so full of contrasts as Mexico. Here you will see a Mexican half-breed barefooted wearing a dollar pair of trousers, a fifty cent shirt and a ten dollar sombrero. There at a single glance and within the length of a single city block you may see an Indian cart, a donkey cart, an oxcart, a carriage, a railroad train, a street car and a motorcar—almost every type of locomotion since Adam. You may tread the burning sands of a tropical desert with a wet of perpetual snow of towering mountains still upon your shoes. You may take a single railway journey of thirty-six hours in which the people you see at the railroad station will be dressed in four different weights of clothing. Everywhere you turn there is contrast, high lights and deep shadows.—William Joseph Showalter in National Geographic Magazine.

Some German Taxes.

Among the curious taxes imposed in Germany on various objects are those on baby carriages, where the amount is 40 cents each and $1.50 tax on caged nightgales, of which there have not been any for many years, and tourists for whom the hotel keeper is taxed 2½ cents, which is added to the bill.

He Had the Bill.

Tom (in restaurant)—Excuse me, old man, but would you mind paying my check? I haven't anything but a forty dollar bill. Jack—A forty dollar bill? Why, I never heard of a bill of that denomination. Tom—Here it is—a bill from my tailor.—Chicago News.

A Forehanded Man.

Tramp—Would you give a poor, starvin' man something to eat, ma'am? Lady of the House—I might, but you are not starvin'. Tramp—I know that, lady; but an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, you know.—Boston Transcript.

A Prince and a Princess

By EDGAR J. THORPE

King John was the father of but one child, a daughter. King David also had but one child, a son. Their kingdoms were very small, and when the heirs to the throne of each were born the two kings agreed to unite their crowns in one by wedding the princess to the prince. In order that when they came to a marriageable age they should not be predisposed to thwart their fathers' designs by an attachment it was agreed that both should be brought up in complete ignorance of the opposite sex.

Prince Edgar while yet a baby was packed off to one of his father's palaces, where his attendants were all men, and an edict was issued that any one who spoke to him of woman should lose his head. Princess Eulalie was sent away to be under the care of women, and she was never to hear the word man.

With an ax suspended over the heads of these people who formed the households of the two royal children, it is not to be wondered that each arrived at the age of eighteen without ever having heard or seen even a picture of one of the opposite sex. Then the two kings arranged that they should meet. Prince Edgar was sent to the palace where Princess Eulalie lived, orders having been first issued that all of her attendants must keep out of sight during the visit. The princess was to be left by herself in a wood where she was in the habit of walking. The prince was told that he was to visit game preserves where he would find excellent shooting.

At the gate his attendants told him that the wood was King David's and they would not be permitted to enter so he went in alone. The princess was sitting on a rustic bench built between two trees when a bullet whizzed within an inch of her ear, accompanied by a report.

The attendants of the prince heard the shot and looked at each other aghast. "A grave error has been committed," said one. "The prince has taken the princess for a bird and shot at her."

"We have obeyed the king's orders," said another carelessly. The princess gave a shriek and fell in a faint. The prince, thinking that he had shot a rare bird, advanced to bag the game. When he reached her he saw in her face, turned upward, features such as he had not seen before.

"Great heavens!" he exclaimed. "I supposed I was shooting at a bird of the peacock variety."

He raised the princess and her head rested in the hollow of his arm. Her lovely lips were parted, showing a row of white teeth. An emotion that he had never felt before impelled him to touch his own lips to hers. The pressure or the warmth or both revived her. She opened her eyes and saw for the first time the face of a man.

The prince was very handsome, with raven curls and a silky beard. His eyes were large and lustrous. "What are you?" she asked. "What are you?" he replied.

He showed no disposition to let her go free, and she showed no disposition to be released.

"I am a woman."

"I am a man."

"What was that pressing on my lips?"

"Mine."

"Put them there again."

The prince did as he was bidden. Indeed, he kissed her a number of times.

"Did you fire at me?" asked the princess.

"Yes, I thought you were some new kind of bird I had never seen—possibly a bird of paradise."

"What strange clothes you wear!" remarked the princess, feeling of the prince's doublet.

"How much finer yours are!" replied the prince, feeling of her silken attire.

"Suppose you had killed me?" asked Eulalie.

"I should have been in agony."

"Why?"

"Because you are the only one of your kind, I suppose, and I like the kind very much."

"What's that hair growing on your face for?"

"Nature put it there. I say, I want you. I'd like to put you into a cage and keep you where you would belong to me only."

"I am the daughter of a king."

"What's a daughter? I am a king's son."

"What's a son?"

"A man child."

"Suppose I ask your father to give you to me. You could live in the same cage with my pet monkey."

"Thank you! No, I prefer rooms. Come let us go to your father. I will buy you of him."

The two sovereigns were waiting in King John's palace for the result of the experiment when the prince and princess approached.

"Father," said the prince, "I want this thing."

The two kings looked at each other.

"What are you going to do with it?" asked King David.

"Well, look at it, feed it and a that."

"How about you, Eulalie?" asked King John, "do you want him?"

"Yes."

"Well, since you both want each other, be it so," said both kings at once.

"Come," said the princess to the prince, "I wish to feed you."
