Poe's Reading.

It was a peculiarity of Poe that when he was most melancholy he read the most lively books, and, being a sort of Mark Twain, he was happiest when he was most miserable. But Poe's rule would not be a good one for the average man to adopt.

Tom Gallagher's Information

By EDITH V. ROSS

Tom Gallagher's term in state prison was finished. He was given some money for present use and started down the street. Tom had nowhere to go and there seemed to be no use looking for a job. That day of making a living by honest work had passed. He had tried work and had tried house-breaking. Several terms at hard labor in prison had led him to prefer hard labor in the open. But if he could get a job—which was not likely without a recommendation, which he did not possess—it wouldn't be long before some one who knew him for what he was would come along and give him away.

He stopped at a restaurant and had a meal, after which he bought a cigar and enjoyed the first good smoke in a long while. Then he walked on into the residence part of the city, inspecting premises with a view to finding one of easy access, from which he might extract something which he might exchange for funds against the time when his meager purse should again need replenishment.

Coming to a fine residence that stood in a lot so large that there were no other houses near it, he stopped and looked it over carefully. There was an arbor for grapes from which a second story window might be reached, and most of the windows on the main floor were not so high but that they could be reached from the ground.

With a view to looking for a weak spot he entered the premises and went round to the rear. Through a window he saw a woman washing dishes. She saw him, too, and to divert suspicion he knocked at the kitchen door and asked if that was Mr. Smith's house. He was taken all aback when the woman said that it was.

"Mr. Jacob Smith?" The woman replied in the affirmative. "Mr. Jacob Brown Smith?" "Yes, Mr. Jacob Brown Smith lives here. Do you wish to see him?" "Tom, not having sufficient wit to extricate himself from such a hole, stood looking at the woman shamefacedly and without reply.

"You don't want to see the owner of the house at all. You are reconnoitering with a view to breaking in to carry off valuables. I saw you sizing up the chances of an entry from the arbor and giving a professional glance at the second story rear window. You ought to know that the safest way for a job like that is to take a servant in and have the whole thing opened up to you."

"Are you in the biz?" asked Tom. "I know all about the craft and can tell one of them on sight. I'm tired of taking risks and will never take an other unless I'm cocksure that there's no chance of my getting caught, and the pay must be big."

"What luck?" exclaimed Tom. "I never thought to find a helper in here. You just put me on to the game and you can make your own terms as to the divvy."

The woman stood looking at Tom with an eye that puzzled him. Then she said: "I reckon I'll trust you. I've had a lot of experience with our kind, and if a person has any good in him at all I can tell it. You won't give me away."

It was arranged between the two that Tom should come to the house that night at 12. He was to find a kitchen window unlocked, through which he might expect an entrance. A back staircase would lead him to a safe built in the wall and he would find the key under a rug near by. He was to take the silver and any cash he might find in the safe and go out with it as he came in. Having turned the swing into cash, he was to meet the woman that day week at the north-west corner of the city park and deliver two-thirds of the profit. Tom was surprised at being so liberally trusted, but this didn't trouble him a bit.

At the appointed hour he appeared at the window and found it unlocked, entered, went to the back staircase, found the key of the safe under the rug and was opening the safe door when suddenly every electric light blazed out at once. Feeling a hand on his shoulder, he turned and looked into the face of a policeman. At the same time he heard a rattle of a dress and the woman with whom he had made the deal appeared on the scene in evening costume.

"Shall I take him away, ma'am?" "Wait a minute, I wish to speak to him." Then, turning to Tom, she added: "When you called this afternoon, both my servants having left me, I was doing my own work. I spent a good deal of my time in the work of resetting packages and recognized you as one I had seen behind bars. You are a better man than you look to be. If you were not handcuffed how would you like to earn an honest living?"

"I'd like it mighty well, ma'am," gasped Tom. A lengthy conversation followed, at the end of which the police were dismissed and Tom was to report the next morning for duty as usual. He appeared, as agreed, and did not leave his employer's service for a number of years. When he did he took with him her recommendation for honesty and faithfulness.

The lady was rehabilitated as a worker with prisoners and possessed a wonderful influence over them.

Ostend's Tribulations.

The first siege of Ostend, the beautiful Belgian city, ended on Sept. 22, 1694, when the city was surrendered to the Spaniards, who had invested the city for over three years. The honorable capitulation followed one of the most heroic defenses in the history of warfare. On the death of Charles II. of Spain the French seized Ostend, but in 1706 after Marlborough defeated the French at Ramillies, it was taken by the allies. In 1745 it was retaken by the French, but restored three years later. In 1756 the French carried the town for the Empress Maria Theresa. In 1762 Ostend again fell to the French, who evacuated it in 1763, regained it in 1764 and defeated the English there in 1768. The city was under the flag of Netherlands from 1814 to 1830, when Belgium regained its independence. Modern Ostend is known as La Reine des Plages (the Queen of Beaches), and for many years it has been the greatest seaside playground of Europe, a favorite resort for the people of all nations.—Exchange.

Babies and Clothes.

According to a London specialist, if white clothing for babies could be abolished, in a generation there would be a 20 per cent decrease in the number of persons with defective eyes.

That Saturday Night Line of Men at the Express Office

THERE'S a strong story in that, Williams—a story of what prohibition is doing for your town. Those men are spending a lot of money because you've tried to deprive them of their honest right to drink beer. That money's going to dealers just twenty miles from your town—not a cent of it ever comes back. It's a sure thing, too, that the express companies don't spend those heavy shipping receipts in your city.

It's the old story of prohibition, Williams. Close the respectable, well-conducted beer saloon and seek by legislation to rob men of their liberty, and you have a problem that never works out in favor of a town. You don't keep men from drinking. Refuse to sell them beer, which they care more they have drunk yesterday because they know it's the drink of True Temperance and beneficial and stimulating, and the stronger drink line looks up. You send thousands of dollars out of the town that ought to be spent right there, and you encourage drunkenness as it has nothing to do with the cause.

E. P. ULRICH, Chamber of Commerce, Portland, Ore.

Machine Guns.

In the British army the machine gun is the Maxim; the French use the Hotchkiss, or Puteaux; Austrians employ the Schwarzlose and Germans the Maxim. In all cases machine guns are attached to the infantry forces, usually in the proportion of two guns per battalion, or 1,000 men.

These guns fire rifle cartridges at immense speed by mechanical means, and usually the kick, or recoil, of the gun is used for the purpose of reloading. It is interesting to note that in a test forty-two British first class shots engaged against a machine gun, each firing at the same target for one minute; the gun discharged 228 rounds and made sixty-nine hits; the forty-two marksmen discharged 408 rounds and made sixty-two hits.—Pearson's Weekly.

An African Night.

There is nothing as black as an African night, and I think that it is because the earth, being a deep red, offers no reflection to the faint starlight such as we get in other lands. Instead it swallows up what slight glow there may be and gives to the darkness a dense, velvety quality not to be found anywhere else. Overhead the stars glare more brilliantly than in northern latitudes, but they seem to cast no light, and the night is palpable, suffocating, appalling and filled with a nameless horror which is quite indescribable.—African Highways.

Unconscious Memory.

The memory of sleepwalkers is occasionally prodigious under the influence of the dominating impulse that moves them. There is an instance of a poor and illiterate basket maker who was unable to read or write, yet in a state of sleep he would preach fluent sermons, which were afterward recognized as having formed portions of discourses he was accustomed to hear in the parish church as a child more than forty years before. Quite as strange a case of "unconscious memory" is referred to by Dr. Abercrombie. A girl given to sleepwalking was in the habit of imitating the violin with her lips, giving the preliminary tuning and scraping and flourishing with the utmost fidelity. It puzzled the physician a good deal until he ascertained that when a child she lived in a room adjoining a fiddler who often performed on his violin in her hearing.—Pearson's Weekly.
