

Carl Weber's Escape

By EUNICE BLAKE

In 1848 a wave of antagonism to monarchical government swept over Europe. It was successful in France, though the republican government established there under Louis Napoleon was converted by him into an imperial one. In Germany the effort was a failure, and the leaders who were able to get away became citizens of other countries, some finding a home in the United States.

One day the government of Prussia received information that Carl Weber, a young man who had been especially active as a leader in the revolution, was intending to board a train in one of its stops after leaving Berlin with a view to escaping through Belgium. The chief of police was notified to take measures to arrest him.

The chief arranged with the railroad officials that any one boarding the train should be put into a certain compartment, where government agents had been placed. These officials, being satisfied that Weber was in the compartment, were to arrest him.

Now, this man Weber had been under the eye of the government for some time, but they had been unable to nab him. Several times they had arrested some one who was supposed to be the revolutionist, and it was discovered that the wrong person had been taken. Indeed, he had achieved a reputation for slipperiness, which induced the chief of police on this notification of his intention to leave Prussia to take every precaution against deception.

In the first place he disguised his men on the train so that they should not be recognized as officials. One was a wrinkled old man, one was made up to look like an English duke, another a young fop. These persons left Berlin in a compartment by themselves. There were three of them, all well armed, for it was known that Weber was a desperate man, who would fight to the death.

At that early day there were not the large number of persons traveling there are now. Railroads were new, and a car resembled several stagecoaches spliced together. In the compartment in which the government officials traveled there was room for eight persons, four riding forward and four backward. Therefore there was room for five besides the officials. At the first station a man was put in with them. They scrutinized him, but shook their heads. Weber was very young, and this man was past fifty. His beard was stubby and gray—a sure sign that he was approaching old age.

At the next station a young girl was conducted to the compartment. Seeing no one in it but men, she declared that it was not a proper place for her to travel. Since the orders were to place every one boarding the train in that compartment, the railway official insisted on her entering it or remaining behind. The latter course would involve waiting over a day, for at that time there were very few trains. The young lady, therefore, with apparent reluctance entered. She held in one hand a portmanteau, in the other a bouquet of flowers. The official made up for a fop gallantly alighted, took her portmanteau (she held on to her bouquet) and handed her into the coach.

The next stop was some distance away, and all trains were very slow. The young lady showed so much embarrassment at being shut up with a lot of men that he who was made up for a Britisher, in feigned broken German, assured her that she might consider herself under his protection, though there was no need of it, for the other two men in the compartment were respectable persons.

This seemed to relieve the young woman's fears. To show her appreciation of his kindness she took a flower from her bouquet and gave it to him. He held it to his nose and, finding the odor delicious, continued to sniff it. The old man settled himself for a nap or pretended to do so, while the portmanteau girl, seeing him covetously at her bouquet, she took out a rose and gave it to him. By this time the Britisher had become drowsy and, leaning his head back on the cushion, fell asleep.

"You do not appreciate the perfume of the rose, here," said the fraulein. "Try this one." She drew forth another and held it to his nose herself, looking into his eyes intently and with a pleasant smile on her lips. The man began to feel drowsy and suspecting that something in the rose was affecting him, endeavored to put it away with his hand. But the fraulein smilingly resisted, and he passed into slumber, her smiling face fading before him.

At this juncture the old man, who was only dozing and that naturally, opened his eyes and seeing one of his companions asleep with his head on the cushion and the other sinking into unconsciousness, looked at the fraulein suspiciously.

"Look!" she cried, pointing out through the window at the same time assuming a frightened expression.

The man looked out, seeing nothing of importance turned again to see himself confronted by a weapon in the hands of the girl. Advancing toward him, she pressed the muzzle of her pistol against his forehead and pressed her bouquet to his nose. He must either get a bullet in his brain or go to sleep. He chose the latter course.

When the train stopped the next station the guard reported that the three men in it were asleep and the fraulein was missing.
