

An Eventful Wedding Journey

By BARBARA PHIPPS

I am one of those American women who have married foreigners. My husband loves me, is kind to me, but I can't help feeling that if the freedom of his people depended upon his taking my life he would nerve himself to do the deed.

There is a story connected with our wedding journey that I am going to tell, though for twenty years whenever I have thought of it my blood has run cold.

I am of a very sympathetic nature and impulsive, and Gustav—as I shall call him—was impassive. I presume it was this difference between us that fascinated me with him. We are prone to admire what we cannot be. He seemed at times to be made of marble. Often when thinking of him I thought at the same time of the sphinx or the pyramids.

"Why do not your people rise and throw off your oppressors?" I asked. "We would be crushed," was the calm reply.

This was all I could get out of him. I could not discern from what he said and did but that his people expected to live under foreign oppression till the crack of doom. Gustav's only hope seemed wild to me. It was that eventually all the sovereigns in the world would be killed off.

I would not consent to marry Gustav unless he would leave his country and go with me to America. This he declined to do because he was needed by the people of his country. How he could be needed by those who were sunk in a hopeless slavery to an autocrat and were making no effort to throw off the yoke I could not imagine. However, while making my preparations to depart he came to me and said that he would go with me. Circumstances had arisen which might enable him to help his people by going elsewhere.

This would have made me very happy had he given me those circumstances that had brought about the change. But he did not, nor could I cajole him to make an explanation. Did he intend to advocate the cause of his countrymen in other countries? No. He would neither speak nor write a word on the subject. Would he resort to diplomacy? No. He would live a life of seclusion.

I might have been able to drive the matter from my mind had not Gustav become more impassive, if possible, than before. He treated me with unusual tenderness. On the day of our marriage he said to me, "Before the ceremony I wish you to forgive me for any injury I may inflict upon you by making you my wife." I naturally took this as indicating a very tender conscience and gave the desired forgiveness.

Gustav applied for a passport to go on his wedding trip. He was delayed in getting it, and our wedding had to be postponed on this account. Why there should have been any delay he did not explain to me, the wedding being timed to take place an hour before the leaving of the train on which we were to depart. On leaving the house my husband spoke a few words to the driver that I did not hear. We were driven to the station by a roundabout way and stopped at a house in a quiet street, Gustav telling me that he wished to leave something there for a friend.

But when he alighted he carried nothing in his hand. The door was opened by a man apparently of the middle class. Gustav stepped inside. The door was closed, but only for a second. My husband reappeared, and we proceeded on our way.

Somehow it struck me that when this brief visit was over Gustav experienced a great relief. He emerged from the house with the most serious look I have ever seen on a man's face, but on entering the carriage he looked at me with an expression which I could only interpret as indicating that there had been a great danger which had now passed. Taking my hand in his, he pressed it, which I took to express the same emotion as his look.

An hour after our train left the station we had crossed the border. There was as much change in my husband at this time as there was after his brief visit. But one thing I noticed—he seemed eager to put distance between us and his former home. We had intended to stop over night in a large city, but Gustav seemed eager to get on, and I consented to proceed to a little town where there were few people and no telegraph.

The next day we passed out of the country adjoining my husband's fatherland and by evening had traversed another nationality, entering Switzerland. Here my husband bought a paper and scanned it eagerly. Suddenly I saw a look of disappointment pass over his face. Looking over his shoulder, I read that on the night following our wedding an attempt had been made to assassinate the governor of the province in which we were married. He had been badly wounded, but not killed.

All was now plain to me. Gus had probably made and certainly delivered the bomb used in the attempted assassination. Indeed, I finally learned that he had it under his arm when we were married and when we were driving to the station.

All this was a great shock to me and has cast a gloom over my life since it occurred. But I forgive my husband; the injury he had done me before we were married.

Curious Papermaking.

In some parts of India there are the natives employ various trees in the attempt to supply their own paper. The Village du Papier, a suburb of Hanoi owes its name to the fact that most of its 2,000 or 3,000 inhabitants make paper from the bark of a shrub, "Papiere," a species of mulberry, found on the Black river in upper Tonkin. This bark is soaked in lime made from the limestone of the village, heated by crude furnaces, fashioned by hand under natural limestone vaults, pounded by pestle into a fine mash, then dissolved in water until a thin paste is reached. This paste is dipped by bamboo screen sieves until a slight film covers the screen. This film is spread on top of others, and each is taken separately or several together and spread with a brush on cement radiators to dry. A single sheet of paper is almost as thin as tissue, but the desired thickness may be obtained by spreading several films on the radiator and drying them together or by pasting the requisite number of sheets together after drying.

Colored Snowstorms.

Colored snowstorms were recorded as long ago as the sixth century, and a shower of red hail is said by Humboldt to have once occurred in Palermo. In Tuscany on March 14, 1813, there fell hail of an orange color. In 1808 red snow fell to a depth of over five feet in Carniola, Austria. The storm of colored snow was followed by one of the regulation color, and the effect produced by the separate layers of red and white, which were perfectly distinct, was very peculiar. A portion of the scarlet snow was melted in a vessel and the water evaporated, when a fine, rose colored earthy sediment was found at the bottom. Snow of a brick red hue fell in Italy in 1816 and in the Tyrol in 1847. In the first volume of Kane's "Arctic Exploration" it is stated that when the ship passed the "Crimson Cliffs" of Sir John Ross the patches of red snow, from which they derived their name, could be seen at a distance of fully ten miles.

Graphic Description.

Zach had been introduced to a new circular saw. The foreman of the sawmills performed the introduction, and after giving Zach a few necessary extra instructions he left him to his work. Zach was really interested in the buzzing blade, and his curiosity getting the better of his discretion, he soon found himself minus a finger. Despite his excitability he was some thing of a stolid, so he bound up his wound without seeking assistance. While he was thus engaged the foreman reappeared. To him Zach described the accident.

"But how on earth did you manage it?" the foreman exclaimed angrily for the prospects of damages ahead were not exactly pleasant. Zach shook his head.

"Sure, an' I don't know," he said. "I just touched the thing like this with my finger when—I'm blessed if there ain't another one gone!"—New York Times.

Contrasts in a Great City.

One of the things that make New York an interesting city is the practice of some shopkeepers of putting in their windows attractive goods with price labels. An arresting instance of this sort was seen recently in a Broadway jeweler's window. Here was a finger ring of diamonds and an emerald, price $12,500; a marquise shaped diamond ring, $4,250; pear shaped diamond pendant, $2,250; diamond earrings, $3,300, and a galaxy of other resplendent gems to appeal to the frequenters of the Great White Way.

At the other extreme of the social scale for the buying public are the pushcarts of New York's east side, equally interesting in their way. On one of these carts in Canal street an astonishing variety of things mechanical was found, among others clocks and watches, music boxes, all kinds of tools and at least a score of second-hand cameras of various makes.—Exchange.

The Hangman's Stone.

There is a large boulder lying in a field near Foremark, England, which is known throughout Derbyshire as the "hangman's stone." The exposed portion of the boulder rises about six feet above the surface of the surrounding field and has a narrow ditch or indentation running across the top. The mark, so tradition says, was made in this way: A sheep thief in the dead of night, while leaning against the boulder to rest, placed his booty above on the flat surface of the stone. The man had the sheep tied with a rope, and in its efforts to escape the creature slipped on the opposite side, and the rope, catching under the thief's chin, choked him to death. The indentation in the rock was made by the friction of the rope while the dying man was engaged in an effort to extricate himself.

No Synonym For English.

A fierce Scottish nationalist who lives among his English friends in a state of chronic protest, pricked up his ears in the railway compartment on hearing the word "English."

"There ye go again," he grumbled. The speaker apologized.

"You don't know what I said, Mac, so I'll repeat it and revise it at the same time. The chief fault of the British is lack of self assertion." "Mac" looked around, and when he saw everybody else was smiling, condescended to see the joke himself, and smiled, too. He even proceeded to make a loud-voiced admission.

"After all, neither Walter Scott nor Thomas Carlyle would have said he wrote British."—Manchester Guardian.

The Diamond.

The diamond is pure carbon or charcoal, but the secret processes by which nature rearranges the atoms of the black, lusterless charcoal into the flashing diamond is a mystery that the chemists, stimulated by the certainty of great gains provided they were successful in finding the solution, have never been able to discover. Nor is it certainly known from what department nature takes the diamond making material. It is supposed to be furnished by vegetable charcoal which undergoes a peculiar process of decomposition and crystallization, but it has also been conjectured that the carbonic acid, shut up from remote periods in the calcareous rocks, may have solidified in this peculiar form.

Deluding the Dog.

When forced to travel all night the Siberian natives make a practice of stopping just before sunrise and allowing their dogs to sleep.

They argue that if a dog goes to sleep while it is yet dark and wakes up in an hour and finds the sun shining he will suppose that he has had a full night's rest and will travel all day without thinking of being tired.—London Telegraph.

A Possibility.

He—if you don't intend to break your engagement with me why do you let Richman make you such valuable presents? She—My father advised me to accept them. He—He did? Why? She—He said if I married you they might come in handy.

Physically Impossible.

"The danger was so near me that my hair stood up on my head." "Then you couldn't have had such a close shave."—Baltimore American.

PRACTICAL HEALTH HINT.

The Medicine Habit. Don't get the medicine habit. Taking a pill doesn't always meet the need. It doesn't reach the cause. The condition that usually calls for a pill or draft of medicine is often a condition which can be readily corrected by proper diet and exercise or rest. A severe headache, for instance, can often be relieved by taking a long, brisk walk in the open air or by abstinence of food or by relaxation and rest. Sluggishness of the intestines, which is sometimes called biliousness, should be corrected by proper diet, consisting of bulky green vegetables, whole cereals, bran, plenty of water and by fresh air and exercise. Proper diet and not medicine is the cure for biliousness. Sleep production drugs are to be avoided and never taken except on the advice and prescription of a physician. If you are really ill and need medicine see a doctor, but don't prescribe for yourself.
