Washington Mills Again Operating

Portland, Aug. 15.—News has reached Portland that the sunny side of the dark clouds, which came over the lumber industry in western Washington the middle of July, has burst into view. Labor disturbances brought on by I. W. W. activities and other influences seem to have lost their force and more sawmills and other wood-working plants are operating than at any time since the operatives quit to enforce demands for a shorter work day and higher pay. According to information telephoned to this city yesterday afternoon from the Seattle office of the West Coast Lumbermen's association, the mills that have resumed have done so on the former basis of pay and hours.

Among the big mills that are running again are the Wilson Bros. Lumber company, at Aberdeen; the Walville Lumber company, Walville; the Seattle Mill & Logging company, the Swager & Nettleton Lumber company, the Canal Lumber company, at Seattle; the Clear Fir Lumber company and the St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber company, at Tacoma; four plants at Blaine, all of the plants at Hoquiam and Bellingham; and nearly all mills on the main line of the railways in the Centralia district.
