MAN SHOT NEAR EAGLE POINT.

Joseph M. Stewart Killed by Neighbor.

Joseph McDonald Stewart, a rancher aged 50 years was shot and killed about 8:30 Monday evening by a neighbor, W. E. Butler, at the Butler ranch on the Brownsboro road about 2½ miles from Eagle Point.

The shooting was the result of a long continued feud over the closing of a county road running by the Butler farm which Butler had repeatedly fenced up although ordered by the court to open it.

There were no witnesses to the shooting except the participants and Stewart died a short time after officers reached the scene. Butler claims that he shot in self-defense but the circumstances surrounding the case do not favor the statement. Butler was armed with a 25-30 Winchester rifle and the empty shells found indicate that he fired five shots. Stewart had a 32 revolver and three empty shells were found near his body. Butler was unharmed in the encounter.

Stewart was shot through the right thigh and did not die for several hours evidently bleeding to death.

An inquest was held Wednesday morning the jury rendering the verdict that Stewart came to his death on Oct. 30, at 12:30 A. M. from a gunshot wound received at the hands of W. E. Butler. Following the inquest, Prosecuting Attorney Roberts preferred a formal charged of murder against Butler and a preliminary hearing before Justice Taylor at Medford was arranged for Friday.

At the hearing before Justice Taylor Friday afternoon only two witnesses were examined, both of whom testified that Butler had called them up Monday night by telephone and stated that he had killed a man. Butler was held over to the grand jury and as bail is not allowed in such cases he was committed to the county jail at this city.

Farmers of Utah Get Six Millions for Beet.

Farmers of Utah will receive approximately six millions of dollars from sugar beets this year, according to estimates prepared in the offices of the Utah-Idaho Sugar company. The figures are indicative of the worth of the sugar industry to this state, showing cold figures just what the farmers reap by reason of having sugar manufacturing centered here. The information is encouraging, in view of the attacks which have been made on the industry, with no apparent motive other than to retard this development in a progressive state.

For months the yellow press of Utah has sought to tear down the sugar industry under one pretext or another. Whatever the motive back of the attacks, it is apparent that it is aimed at the welfare of the state. The figures indicate that the scheme made little impression and this may be attributed to the fact that poison fed to a body possessing all the vigor of health which comes from industrious pursuits meets counteracting elements.

The money which will be received by the farmers is but a part of the benefits brought to Utah by the sugar industry. Fifteen factories in constant operation during the harvesting season means another great benefit to the people of the state, as it goes without saying that the payrolls of these factories amount to something.—Salt Lake Herald-Republican.

A Story of the New Republic

By EDWARD I. STEWART

Cornwallis had surrendered, and the independence of the United States was established. My regiment had been disbanded, and I was on my way to my home in Pennsylvania. I had neither horse nor money for traveling purposes and got on as best I could, securing a lift here and using river currents there, till I reached a point not a dozen miles from home. There I found a friend, who got out his coach and started me on the last relay between Yorktown and my father's estate, for I was sick and weary and could go no farther.

I started shortly before dark and had made half the distance when the coach came to a sudden stop, and a voice at the window cried out:

"Your money or your life!"

"Money I have none," I replied, "but my watch is at your disposal."

Taking from my pocket a timepiece that my father had given me and to whose fob hung a dainty locket containing a miniature likeness of my mother, I handed it to the robber, who without another word made off, his horse's hoofs beating the road, the sounds dying away in the distance.

I had seen nothing of him through the darkness, and all I had heard was his demand for plunder. By this I judged that he was very young or that his voice was pitched in a high key for a man, since it had none of that gruffness to be expected in a robber. Indeed, there was a shrinking in it that would have led me to fight for my possessions had I been armed.

I was a long while after reaching home in recovering from the exposure I had so long endured in the war of independence and several wounds given me by the redcoats, but at last I regained my strength and took sufficient interest in what was going on about me to ask after certain friends I had left when I had joined the army. It was then that I learned what my country had endured during the long war. There was little left to eat or to wear, and many farmers had been reduced to a pitiable condition.

Such times are prolific of crime, and I was told that same persons of respectability had been reduced to getting a living in any way they could, some resorting to robbery, while others had been obliged to pilfer. This led me to think of the youngster who had robbed me of my watch on the road.

One of the first visits I made after I had regained my strength was to the Leslies. I had a fancy that if any families pulled through the hard times they would be among the lot, for they were rich in lands. But I found that the more land a person had during the Revolution the poorer he was left, for the land was not productive, and the taxes on it, being badly needed by the state, were rigorously collected. I found Mrs. Leslie at home with her younger children. Her husband and oldest son had gone down in the war. Her daughter Madge, who, to tell the truth, I wished especially to see, was not at home. When I asked the mother where she was the poor woman stammered out several contradictory statements, by which I knew the girl had met with a mishap. I shuddered, because I knew that great were the dangers to young girls in times of war.

But now that our people had got rid of a king who must needs appropriate all our gains to himself we began to pluck up spirit and start in for recovery. My father, in order to help the courage of the others, decided to give a ball, to which he invited the country gentry. There were some who had no fit clothes in which to appear on such an occasion, but they all came in what they had. Most of the women prepared their own costumes out of old stores, and but few wore gems.

On the afternoon before the ball I was told that Madge Leslie had returned to her home, and I saw to it that she received a special invitation, though this was not necessary since no well bred person would be so rude as to leave out any member of a family in an invitation. When I had gone to the war several years before, Madge was a girl of sixteen, and I wondered how she would now appear.

When Mrs. Leslie was announced by the servant at the door of the ballroom she was accompanied by a tall girl who was dressed in more finery than any other woman present. I soon learned that she was Madge Leslie, and I wondered how, since her family had become so impoverished, she had been able to deck herself out so splendidly. I approached her and was about to ask her to dance when another man engaged her. As she danced I noticed that an ornament suspended to her neck by a gold chain bobbed up and down on her bosom.

As soon as she was disengaged I joined her and saw near by the ornament I had noticed. It was a duplicate of the one of which I had been robbed on my return from the war. Seizing it, I opened it, and there was my mother's miniature.

Madge paled a little, but said nothing. I led her to a place where we would not be observed and asked for an explanation. She confessed that to put food into the mouths of her family she had taken to the road. She had not known that I was the person she had robbed of the locket and, since she had never opened it, did not know of the miniature it contained.

I hushed the matter up. Madge returned what she had appropriated of the goods of others, some of which she wore to the ball, and became one of the first ladies of the land.
